

No. 602

APRIL 13, 1917

SIX Cents

FAME ^{AND} FORTUNE WEEKLY.

STORIES OF BOYS THAT MAKE MONEY.

FACING THE WORLD; OR, A POOR BOY'S FIGHT FOR FORTUNE.

By A SELF-MADE MAN
AND OTHER STORIES

While two of the tramps busied themselves emptying Joe Benton's valise, the thin ruffian compelled the boy to exchange clothes with him, and the stout rascal appropriated his derby. "Now skip!" cried the latter menacingly, pointing down the road.

FAME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY

STORIES OF BOYS WHO MAKE MONEY

Issued Weekly—By Subscription $3.00 per year. Entered at the New York, N. Y., Post Office as Second-Class Matter by Frank Tousey, Publisher, 168 West 23d Street, New York.

No. 602.

NEW YORK, APRIL 13, 1917.

Price 6 Cents.

FACING THE WORLD

—OR—

A POOR BOY'S FIGHT FOR FORTUNE

By A SELF-MADE MAN.

CHAPTER I.

IN THE SHADOW OF THE RUM BOTTLE.

"So your mother is worse, eh?" said Tom Waldron sympathetically. "I feel dead sorry for you, Joe."

"It isn't more than I've expected," replied Joe, with a sob in his voice, though his eyes were dry and shone with a feverish light that betokened loss of sleep. "Mother isn't made of cast iron. There's a limit to everything, and she's reached hers at last."

"Do you think she's going to die?"

"I do," replied Joe, in a tone of conviction.

"It's too bad," replied Tom.

"I don't know," answered the other. "She'll be better off dead. If there's a bright world beyond the skies, that I've heard the minister speak about, she'll go there, and be happy. I hate to lose her," choking up and turning his face away, "but why should she linger on and suffer? Nobody knows what she has gone through but herself and—me. I've heard her talk at night, and cry out, while I sat by the bed, and what she said was enough to drive me mad—mad, do you understand, Tom Waldron?" And the speaker grabbed his companion by the arm with a grip that made the other wince.

"Doesn't your father understand how things are going?" asked Tom.

"Don't mention him. I don't know whether he does or not. At any rate, he doesn't seem to care. He's drunk three-quarters of the time. In fact, he's never wholly sober at any time."

"Drink is a terrible thing, Joe."

"It's a curse!" cried the other vehemently. "It's made a brute and a wreck of my father, and paupers of mother and me. It has brought mother to the grave, for she can't last much longer. Once my father was as industrious and respectable as any man in the county. Now look at him—a common sot, and a reproach not only to his family but the village as well."

Tom Waldron nodded.

He knew the facts of the sad case only too well.

Everybody in Glenwood knew them, and sympathized, after a fashion, with poor Mrs. Benton and the bright boy who was her sole support and consolation in her hour of trouble.

A few of the villagers, whose hearts were really touched by the desperate plight of the unfortunate woman and her son, went out of their way to assist them. The others—and they were largely in the majority—contented themselves with expressing their sentiments by word of mouth when they met at the sewing circles and other social gatherings.

They appeared to feel sorry for Mrs. Benton; no doubt they honestly were, but their sorrow never took practical shape.

The drunkard's wife was so far down the social scale that they could not think of visiting the poor hovel where she lived.

It hurt their feelings to think of coming into contact with such a person.

They might contract some disease, they argued, or soil their clothes.

They shuddered when they thought of the unfortunate woman, and thanked the good Lord that they were not like her.

They opened their purses to the missionary fund, but forgot that poor Mrs. Benton needed money and human sympathy more than the Hottentots of South Africa, or the savages of the South Sea Islands.

"I've heard it said that Ike Horton is the cause of your father's ruin," said Tom Waldron.

"Then you've heard the truth."

"He tempted your father to drink."

"He did."

"He encouraged him to idle away his time at the tavern."

"That's true."

"And when your father became a slave to the bottle Ike disappeared from the village."

"So he did."

"The man acted like a scoundrel."

"Yes. If he isn't dead, he may get all that's coming to him yet."

"I hope he will. He deserves to be handled without gloves."

"That won't make my father a sober and honorable man again, nor will it bring back the wasted happiness of mother's life, or save her from a pauper's grave."

"Ike Horton must have had a reason for acting as he did. Do you know what it was?"

"I can guess. His reason was revenge."

"Revenge!" exclaimed Tom, in some surprise.

"Yes. He and father both wanted to marry mother. She chose my father. I have since heard that Ike Horton swore to get square with them both."

"If he did, he has kept his word."

"Like a coward and cur; not like a man. He worked in the dark, like a snake in the grass. His friendship for father and mother was a pretence to cover his designs. Mother woke up to the true state of things when it was too late. Then she warned father, and did everything she could to save him and herself from the fate the rascal had marked out for them. But he had his hooks in, and you see the result."

"Can I do anything for you, Joe? If I can, I'll be glad to help you out," said Tom.

"I don't know that you can, just now."

"You look tired and played out. Is there any one with your mother?"

"Yes. Widow Cameron. She's done a whole lot for us, off and on. She deserves a gold medal. Well, I must get on with this medicine the doctor ordered for mother. He's another good chap. He knows we can't pay him, but he told me that didn't make any difference. He says money isn't everything in this world."

"It may not be everything, but it cuts a mighty big figure, just the same," replied Tom. "Well, so-long. I'll call over and see you after supper."

"All right. I'll look for you."

Thus speaking, Joe Benton continued on up the road, while Tom turned into a lane which led to a small but well-kept farm.

We will follow Joe.

He was an intelligent-looking, sturdy boy, with a frank, open countenance that attracted one to him, in spite of his apparel, which showed the pinch of poverty.

He had been born and raised in the village of Glenwood, in the western part of New York State, and had obtained a fair education at the district school.

When his father, who had once been a prosperous carpenter, became a loafer and an inebriate, the support of the family devolved on him.

He obtained work during the season at the different farms in the neighborhood, and was well liked because of his industrious habits.

His young hands kept the wolf from the door, and things might have gone fairly well with him and his mother but for the conduct of his father, as the man sank lower and lower in the human scale.

A goodly portion of the money Joe turned in to his mother was taken from her through the intimidating tactics of her worthless husband, and went to swell the profits of the proprietor of the tavern and roadhouse on the outskirts of the village.

It was some time before Joe got on to this fact.

He wondered where his father got the coin to pay for all the liquor he drank.

When the truth came out, he was greatly discouraged over the outlook.

Before he had decided what course to adopt, so as to cut off his father's source of revenue, his mother took a severe cold, which developed into hasty consumption, and the good-hearted doctor who volunteered to attend her free of charge saw that she was doomed, and broke the news as gently as he could to the boy.

The condition of Mrs. Benton did not awaken any sense of remorse in the breast of her husband.

He treated her, if anything, worse than before, because he could not get any money from her.

The tavern keeper, however, trusted him, on the strength of his statement that his wife, being ill, he couldn't get any money till she got better.

It was his habit to stay at the barroom all the afternoon, and as far into the night as he was permitted, and then return home, and raise Cain generally and sleep off the effects of his booze.

After parting from Tom Waldron, Joe walked up the road a little way till he came to the poor-looking cottage that he called home.

It stood close by the road, with a small piece of ground, once a pretty garden, in front, and a much larger piece of ground, on which stood a couple of ruinous outbuildings, in the rear.

A hen or two, with a brood of newly hatched chicks, wandered around the forlorn-looking yard, and were the only signs of life visible about the place.

All the rest of the live stock had been carried off and sold by the dissolute Benton, and their acquisition, at bargain rates, was not much to the credit of the persons who bought them, and thus encouraged the man's worst propensities at the expense of his unfortunate wife and son.

The place would have worn a much more wretched look but for the efforts of Joe to keep the weeds down and the yard as neat as possible.

The interior of the cottage would have gone to rack and ruin only for the industrious labor of Mrs. Benton.

The poor woman was now no longer able to attend to the place, and never would again, and her two weeks' spell in bed showed itself in many ways throughout the house.

Everything was turned topsy-turvy in the kitchen, sitting-room, and the small bedroom occupied by her husband, for William Benton never failed to make his presence felt around the house when he was not snoring away in bed like an overfed pig.

He and Joe had many a scrap, out of some of which the boy narrowly escaped with his life, for Benton, Senior, was dangerous when the demon rum had him well under control.

CHAPTER II.

A DRUNKARD'S REVENGE.

The sun was sinking behind the hills in the west, gilding the kitchen windows with its golden radiance, when Joe opened the gate and let himself into the front yard.

He walked around to the kitchen door and entered the cottage.

A pot of chicken broth was simmering on the stove, but there was no one in the room, which had been tidied up a bit since the boy went to the village.

Joe walked softly upstairs, for he did not wish to disturb his mother, who might be asleep.

The good-hearted Widow Cameron was seated by the window overlooking the road.

She had noted Joe's arrival, and heard his steps on the stairs.

"How's mother?" he whispered.

"About the same, Joe," replied the widow, with a sad look.

"Do you think she'll live through the night?"

"Why, Joe!—you don't expect her to die as soon as that, do you?" she said, in a shocked voice.

"I don't know," replied the boy despondently. "The doctor hasn't any hopes. He told me that she might go off any time, like the snuffing out of a candle, especially if anything should happen to excite her."

"What should happen——" began the widow, and then she stopped.

The question was superfluous under the circumstances of the case.

Anything might happen when William Benton came home with a jag on.

In his wife's weakened and nervous condition an outburst on his part might sap her little remaining vitality.

"Father might——" began Joe, in reply to her half-formed remark.

"Yes, I know," interrupted the Widow Cameron. "Don't let us talk about it."

"Joe, is that you?" came a weak voice from the bed.

"Yes, mother. I have brought the medicine."

"Thank you, dear. You're a good boy, Joe."

"You had better take some of it now. Will you give it to her, Mrs. Cameron? The directions are on the bottle."

The widow took the package from Joe, opened it, and read the directions.

It was to be taken in some water, and so the good woman went downstairs to get a glass and prepare the medicine for the patient.

"How do you feel, mother?" asked Joe, when alone with his parent.

"I feel very weak and listless. I have scarcely any pain now. I'm afraid that is a bad sign. It means that I shall not be long with you, Joe."

"Mother!" said the boy, controlling his voice by a strong effort.

"It is hard to leave you, my poor child, but perhaps it is for the best. Heaven's will be done. I know I am dying, so why try to keep the fact from you? I want you to promise me one thing."

"I promise, mother, no matter what it is," said Joe solemnly.

"Prome me, Joe, on your knees, beside your mother's death-bed, that you never will touch strong drink."

"I promise you, mother," said the boy, kneeling down. "I never intended to, anyway. It has been father's ruin, but it never shall be mine—I swear it!"

"I believe you, Joe, and I shall die happy knowing that you, at least, will not become a victim of the rum bottle."

"Nothing more was said, as the Widow Cameron entered with the medicine, which she administered to the sick woman.

Half an hour later she fed her some of the broth.

When it began to grow dark she took her leave, promising to call in the morning.

Joe was left alone with his mother, who dozed off to sleep.

The boy then went down to the kitchen, prepared a frugal supper for himself and ate it.

Returning to the chamber above, he sat by the window, looking out into the night, and wondering what he should do when his mother was no longer with him.

His thoughts toward his father were very bitter.

His mother's approaching death he laid at his door.

He was determined on one thing—when his mother's life went out, he would cut loose entirely from his father.

At that moment he didn't care if he ever saw his father again.

The slam of the front gate aroused him from his sad reverie.

"That's Tom," he said to himself. "I will go down and meet him."

Waldron was knocking on the kitchen door when Joe drew the bolt and admitted him.

"How's your mother?" asked Tom.

"The same."

"Here's some jelly and things mother sent over," said Tom, placing a package on the table.

"Thanks," replied Joe gratefully. "Your mother is very kind to remember us."

"She'll be over herself, to-morrow, to see if she can be of any help."

"I am very much obliged to her. She had better not come till the afternoon, as my father may wake up and make things disagreeable in the forenoon."

"All right. I'll tell her," replied Tom.

"Wait a minute, till I slip upstairs and see if mother is still asleep."

Joe found that she was sleeping calmly, like a tired child, and returned to the kitchen, where he and Tom talked for some time together.

Finally Waldron took his leave, and Joe returned to his lonely vigil in the bedroom.

The hours passed slowly away, and the sick woman slept peacefully through them, while the lonely boy sat and gazed through the window into the obscurity without.

He was not trying to see into the darkness.

He was thinking—dreaming of what the future had in store for him.

Gradually his heavy eyes closed, in spite of his efforts to keep awake, his head fell over on his arm, and he slept.

At length midnight approached, and down the road reeled the figure of a man.

This man was William Benton.

Drunk, as usual, but in an uglier humor than ordinarily, for the tavern keeper, after a scrap with him, had ejected him into the road, and told him not to come back there any more, or he'd have him put in the lock-up as a vagrant and common lush.

Benton, after shaking his fist at the man who had practically made him what he was, and muttering dark threats of revenge, started for the only place left him to go—the home he had wrecked.

Drunk as he was, he knew how to get there.

After two or three falls, he came in sight of the cottage.

"There's a light (hic!) in the window for me," he caroled. "I wonder if the old (hic!) woman is waitin' up to let me in? For he's a jolly good fel—no he isn't! He kicked me out to-night. Threw me into the road like a bum. After all the money I've spent at his place. I'll fix him for it. I'll get (hic!) square, or my name's not Bill Benton. I'll set fire to his blamed old house. I won't go home to-night till I have revenge. I'll go back. No man shall throw (hic!) me into the road like a bum. I won't stand it!"

William Benton turned around and began to retrace his unsteady steps.

The fumes of the liquor fired his brain and gave him such an exaggerated idea of the treatment he had received at the hands of the tavern keeper that he was ready for any desperate project.

As he drew near the tavern again, now closed tight, and dark within and without, he seemed to grow more steady and resolute.

He had but one idea in his head, and that was to set the building on fire.

Unfortunately, he was so well acquainted with the place that he readily picked out its most vulnerable part—an opening under the front porch, through which he crawled.

Here the boards forming the top of the cellar were rotten and punky from age.

He tore several away, with little noise, for they seemed to crumble under his grasp.

Then he lowered himself into the cellar.

Lighting a match, he looked around.

There were empty boxes, filled with excelsior, lying around, and several barrels containing spirits, in one of which stood a tin funnel, thrust into the bung-hole.

The drunkard took a lantern from a nail in a beam and lighted it.

Then he placed all the boxes containing excelsior together in a heap, and saturated them with spirit drawn from one of the barrels.

He was foxy enough to place a barrel under the hole by which he had entered the cellar, so he could crawl out easily after he had lighted the inflammable material.

Making sure that everything was ready for the blaze, he opened the door of the lantern, took out the candle, and placed it in the under box of the pile.

In a moment the excelsior was on fire.

Dropping the lantern, he hastily crawled out of the cellar, and, taking to the road, walked away in a pretty steady manner, as compared with his movements after having been ejected from the tavern.

CHAPTER III.

CRIME AND DEATH.

While William Benton was executing his incendiary job, his son Joe and his wife were asleep in the room overlooking the road.

Suddenly Mrs. Benton woke up, with a frightened cry on her lips, that aroused Joe in an instant.

"Mother," he said, going to her, "did you call me?"

Then he noticed the look of terror on her countenance and the excited state she was in.

"Why, mother!—what is the matter?"

"Your father!" she gasped.

Joe looked around the room, expecting to see him there, though the doors below were locked and the windows secure.

He soon saw that there was no one in the room but themselves.

"What about father?" he asked. "He has not come home yet."

"I know it," faltered the poor woman.

"Then why did you mention his name?"

"Oh, Joe! Joe!—I've had a terrible dream about your father!"

"A terrible dream, mother?"

"Yes! yes! I dreamed he committed a fearful crime!"

"A crime!"

"I saw him as plain as I see you now, in a cellar under some building. There were barrels of liquor there, and boxes filled with some kind of white stuff, like shavings. Your father piled the boxes up, and then set fire to them. There was an awful look of satisfaction on his face, as if he was taking revenge on some one. Oh, Joe! what can it mean? Do you think——"

She broke off with a scream.

"Look, Joe!—look!—a fire! See the blaze through the trees! It is just as I saw it in my dreams, after your father had started it!"

Joe turned and looked out of the window.

Sure enough, there was a fire, that was growing brighter every minute, in the direction of the village.

The coincidence of his mother's dream and this fire startled him.

"Joe, your father started that fire! I know—I feel it!"

"Nonsense, mother! Father may be a drunkard, but he is not a criminal!"

The poor woman only wrung her hands, beating the air in a paroxysm of excitement that was pitiful to see.

What she had seen in her dream was too real to be disregarded by her.

Bad as her husband had been, she had never known him to do anything that would bring him within the strong arm of the law, but now she was certain that he had committed a great crime, and the knowledge stirred her gentle nature to its depths.

Joe tried his best to calm her, but she would not be quiet until she collapsed from utter exhaustion.

And while he strove with her the fire grew brighter and brighter, until the sky glowed with carmine.

The flames rose high above the trees, and the distant jingle of the one-hand fire engine the village owned came faintly to the boy's ears on the early morning breeze.

His own nerves tingled with excitement as the fire cast its ruddy reflection into the room, and had his mother been well, he would have been among the first on the ground, to witness the conflagration at close quarters.

Joe induced his mother to take her medicine, and after a time she grew quiet and dozed off to sleep again.

Then the boy watched the fire from the window until it gradually died away.

"That was close enough to be the tavern," he muttered. "It would be a good thing if the place was destroyed. Why was it not wiped out three years ago, when my father first started to go there? Only for that tavern, father might have been a respectable man to-day, and mother——"

His voice faltered, and he said no more.

Looking at the clock, he saw that it was two in the morning.

Joe wondered where his father could be keeping himself at that hour.

Not at the tavern, for that closed between eleven and midnight.

Then where could he be?

Never, to Joe's knowledge, had he remained out so late before.

Although he didn't care much if his father remained away all night, still the strangeness of his absence made him a bit uneasy.

He walked downstairs and out to the gate facing the road.

The road, as far as he could see, was silent and deserted.

So he gave the matter up and returned to the bedroom.

He watched his mother for a while, and finally dropped off asleep.

The sun, shining through the window, awoke him.

He was astonished to think that he had slept so long.

He looked at his mother.

She still seemed to be sleeping quietly, so he went downstairs, lighted a fire in the stove, and made some breakfast for himself.

After eating it, he walked outside and looked up and down the road, but there was nothing to indicate that his father was in the neighborhood.

He stood a while, leaning on the gate, drinking in the cool morning air. Then he saw Tom Waldron coming up the road.

"Where was the fire last night, Tom? I saw it from the window of mother's room."

"That was Ralston's tavern. It was completely destroyed early this morning, and the owner and his family only escaped by the skin of their teeth."

"That so? Did you learn how the fire occurred?"

"Constable Black has a strong suspicion that some one set the place on fire."

"How?"

"By forcing an entrance into the cellar from the front."

"What reason has he for thinking so?"

"There are a number of suspicious circumstances that have come to light during the investigation which began a short time ago. There is no doubt whatever that the blaze started in the cellar. From a pile of burned fragments of boxes, all in one place, where they shouldn't have been, according to Ralston's statement, as well as the charred remains of a barrel at a point where no barrel was when Ralston looked into the cellar before turning in for the night, together with the position in which the elements of the lantern were found, the opinion is freely passed around that the fire was clearly of incendiary origin."

While Tom was speaking, Joe suddenly remembered his mother's dream about his father piling boxes filled with shavings up in a cellar and setting them on fire.

This remarkable vision, added to the fact of his father's prolonged absence, and the apparently incendiary origin of the tavern fire, made the boy feel decidedly uneasy.

He could not bring himself to believe that his father was really guilty of the crime of destroying the roadhouse, but, nevertheless, things looked suspicious.

He asked Tom many questions about the fire, and his friend gave him all the particulars he had been able to obtain.

Joe did not dare ask Tom whether he had seen or heard anything about his father, lest his questions might ultimately arouse suspicion against his disreputable parent.

After Tom had said all he had to say, he told Joe that he couldn't stay any longer, and started off for his home.

He had hardly gone before a man came slouching out of the bushes and approached the gate.

His bloodshot eyes, uncertain gait, and wretched appearance betokened the slave of intemperance.

Joe recognized him at once as his father.

"Let me in," said the man hoarsely, with a furtive, almost frightened, look over his shoulder, as if he thought some one was coming up to him from behind. "Let me in—d'ye hear!"

Joe opened the gate, and his father pushed roughly past him and made for the house.

Suddenly he stopped, and turned around.

He saw his son's eyes following him.

He walked back in a savage and threatening way.

"If anybody comes here lookin' for me, tell 'em I'm in bed," he snarled. "Tell 'em I've been home all night, d'ye understand?"

"Where have you been, father?" asked the boy.

"None of your blamed business where I've been!" cried William Benton savagely. "You do as I tell you! Don't you dare say I didn't come home till mornin'! If you do, I'll kill you!"

The look that accompanied the words was almost murderous, and greatly disturbed Joe.

He had never known his father to be quite so ugly after sleeping off a good bit of his nightly debauch.

Evidently there was something unusual the matter with him, and Joe's suspicions of his father's guilt began to grow.

He decided to tell him about the fire, to see how he'd take it.

It took a lot of nerve for him to broach the subject under the circumstances, but Joe was a plucky boy.

"Father," he said, looking him straight in the eye, "do you know that Ralston's tavern was burned to the ground early this morning?"

William Benton glared at his son with the eyes of a wild beast at bay.

"It's a lie!" he shouted hoarsely. "I know nothin' about it! Who says it was burned?"

"I say so."

"You infernal little imp!" roared his father. "Do you accuse me of settin' fire to it?"

He seized Joe by the throat with a grip that choked the boy.

"Take it back! Take it back—d'ye hear?—or I'll murder you!"

Joe, by a desperate struggle, succeeded in freeing his neck from his infuriated father's grasp.

"Leave me alone, will you?" he said doggedly. "I did not say that you set fire to the place. I said it was burned down."

"But your eyes accuse me. You believe I did it. I know you do. If you give me away, I'll be the death of you!"

"If you say you didn't do it, I s'pose you didn't," replied Joe, holding himself in readiness to avoid another attack.

"I didn't do it!—nobody saw me do it! It's a lie! I was home all night—all night, d'ye understand? Don't you dare tell any one I wasn't, or——"

His passion choked further utterance, and he stood and glared at his son like a wild beast.

"If you say you were home all night nobody shall learn anything different from me, whether you set fire to the tavern or not," replied the boy. "You are my father, whether you are guilty or not, and no act of mine shall bring a crime home to you. Go to bed, for you look as if you needed rest. If any one sees you standing here, with that look on your face, it may cause suspicion to rest on you. Go into the house right away, and then maybe I'll be able to forget that I've seen you this morning."

His father seemed to grasp the meaning of his words, for with another furtive look up and down the deserted road he turned sullenly away and started for the house.

Joe watched him disappear around the corner of the house.

Then he followed in a dejected way.

"My father is a criminal! Yes, his words and actions proclaim his guilt. He set the tavern on fire, just as mother dreamed he did. There isn't the least doubt in my mind about it. This is the last straw that makes our misery complete. Thank heavens, murder was not a part of his desperate action. Why did he do it? What motive urged him to the commission of such a terrible act? Was it simply because his mind was crazed by liquor, and he did not know what he was doing? What a curse drink is! It is the father of all crime. Poor mother! If you knew how low father has now fallen, you would not survive the terrible shock."

He entered the house and softly walked upstairs.

His father was not in sight.

He tiptoed to the bedside, where his mother lay, silent and motionless.

One look at her white staring eyes, and fallen jaw, told him the truth.

With a cry of grief and despair, he threw his arms about her.

"Mother! mother! Speak to me! No! no!—she cannot!—she is dead—dead!"

He slipped to the floor, and, with his extended arms across his mother's body, he wept as if his heart would break.

And there he was found, an hour later, by Widow Cameron, when she came over to see the patient, as she had promised to do.

CHAPTER IV.

TEACHING A BULLY A LESSON.

The tavern fire created a good deal of excitement in the village, especially when it became known that it was thought to be of incendiary origin.

The question which then agitated the people was who could have done the deed.

As soon as Ralston became satisfied that somebody had fired his building, his suspicions pointed to William Benton.

Benton had threatened him the night before, and, putting two and two together, the tavern keeper applied to the justice for a warrant against the suspect.

The head constable was sent to serve it, and he drove out to the Benton cottage on the county road to find the person he was after.

When he arrived there, a silence hung over the cottage, and he soon learned of the death of Mrs. Benton from the Widow Cameron.

Being a man of feeling, he decided that, under the circumstances, he would postpone serving the warrant, so he drove back into the village and announced the death of the drunkard's wife.

Ralston made a stiff kick because the constable had failed to do his duty.

"The man won't run away, I guess," replied Constable Black stiffly. "Besides, you have no direct evidence against him, and I don't think that, in view of the death of his wife, the warrant ought to be served until after the funeral. It would be hardly Christianlike."

"You have no right to let your private feelings interfere with the execution of your duty," answered Ralston angrily. "I'm sure Benton is the person who fired my house, and if you don't go right back and arrest him, I'll see the justice about the matter."

"I won't arrest him to-day, at any rate," replied the constable. "If you don't like the way I do business, you can call on Justice Cox and make your complaint."

Constable Jones turned on his heel and went to the office of the justice, where he explained why he had not served the warrant.

While he was there, Ralston came in and had his say on the subject.

The justice settled the matter by telling the constable that it was up to him.

If the suspect skipped the village, he would hold the officer responsible; otherwise, he didn't see that any harm would be done by deferring the arrest.

Ralston, who was mighty mad over the destruction of his property, as well as the loss of the profits because his business had been brought to a standstill, went away with a grouch on, and began to spread the news broadcast of how badly he was being treated.

This naturally prejudiced the village against William Benton, and caused the impression to prevail that he was the incendiary.

When the constable learned of Ralston's tactics, he was much incensed.

He found that it would be necessary to set a watch on Benton's movements, since, if he was guilty, and he learned that he was to be arrested, he probably would seek to leave the neighborhood.

After his first burst of grief, Joe Benton left his dead mother to the kind offices of Widow Cameron and other sympathetic women, and walked off into the woods, to hide his sorrow from public notice.

He sat down on a fallen tree and buried his face in his hands.

He had not been there very long before Job Ralston, son of the tavern keeper, who was very like his father in disposition and character, came along with a crony of his.

They were on their way to inspect some rabbit traps, and find out what luck was in store for them that morning.

For some reason, known only to himself, Job Ralston hated Joe Benton.

It might have been because the boy was popular in the neighborhood, while he was just the reverse.

The fact that he, the son of a well-to-do tavern keeper, was at a discount alongside of Joe, the drunkard's son, probably had a good deal to do with the matter.

At any rate, he never failed to assume an offensive attitude whenever he met the object of his aversion.

Joe, for fear that his father might suffer at the hands of the tavern keeper if he resented Job's mean tactics, forbore to get into a scrap with him, though he felt abundantly able to polish off the tavern keeper's son if he chose to bring matters to an issue.

On this occasion Job was more than ever incensed against Joe because of his conviction, acquired from his father, that William Benton was the cause of the destruction of the tavern.

The knowledge of the recent death of Joe's mother did not excite a grain of sympathy in his breast.

He despised the whole Benton family—Joe worst of all.

"Hello!" said Sam Parker, Job's companion. "Who's that sittin' on that log?"

Job's sharp, ferret-like eyes recognized Joe at once.

"It's that beast of a Joe Benton!" he snarled. "What is he doin' on that log? Looks as if somethin' was wrong with him."

"Oh, I s'pose he's moonin' over his old woman's death. It's a good thing she did turn up her toes. It saves the county the expense of supportin' her, for she was bound to reach the poorhouse some time, if she'd lived," he said heartlessly.

"It wouldn't have been her fault if she had," said Sam, who had some feeling.

"What difference does it make whose fault it was? She died just in time, for Bill Benton will be sent to State prison for burnin' our place down, and this lobster will have to leave the village, for nobody will hire the son of a jail-bird. Ain't I glad of that! I hate the little beast!"

"Well, come on! Let's hurry over to the traps," said Sam, manifestly impatient to find out if any game had been snared overnight.

Job, however, seemed to forget that he had been in an equal hurry himself a few minutes before.

The sight of the unhappy-looking Joe was an attraction he couldn't resist.

He was in a bullying humor, and he considered the drunkard's son a fit subject to practice on.

Being a coward as well, prudence suggested that he get hold of a stick to use in case Joe should happen to show fight.

So he looked around for one, and, as the woods were full of suitable saplings, he soon had a weapon in his hand. Then he opened proceedings.

"Hello, Joe Benton! What are you sniveling about?" he said offensively, while a satisfied grin rested on his sandy, pock-marked features.

At the sound of his voice, Joe looked up quickly.

It was the first intimation he had that he was no longer alone.

He looked at the two boys, but made no reply, and waited for them to go on.

"Come on, Job!" said Sam. "What's the use of wasting time with him? I've got to get back to the store some time to-day."

Sam's father kept the general store, and Sam acted as general clerk and delivery boy.

Job paid no attention to his companion's request, but stood and glowered at Joe.

"So your old woman's dead, is she?" he said sneeringly. "I s'pose the village will have to stand the expense of plantin' her. That's the worst of havin' paupers around. They're a blamed nuisance, the whole brood of 'em."

The words were hardly out of the bully's mouth before Joe was on his feet, facing him, with clenched fists and a look of suppressed fury blazing in his eyes.

"How dare you talk that way about my mother, Job Ralston!" he cried, in a voice that trembled with wrath.

The young rascal, though he had a stick in his hand, recoiled a step or two, as if afraid Joe would strike him.

"Ho! Ain't we mad all of a sudden!" he replied jeeringly.

"You go on where you're bound, and leave me alone," answered Joe. "I'm in no humor to be tantalized."

"Who you givin' orders to, you lobster?" snorted Job. "I'll go on when I feel like it. The idea of a feller like you givin' me back talk! A feller whose father is a crook—"

Smash!

The word was hovering on his lips when Joe sprang at him like a wildcat and struck him in the jaw with a force that knocked him down.

"You lying cur!" cried the infuriated lad, standing over him in an aggressive way. "My father is no more a crook than your father is!"

"Sam! Sam!" cried Job, in a whining tone, for he was thoroughly alarmed at Joe's attitude. "Help me out! Slug him—quick!"

Sam was not anxious to mix himself up in a scrap in which he had no special interest, especially as Joe looked exceedingly dangerous, so he failed to respond to Job's appeal.

Job, finding that he could expect no aid from his companion, dragged himself back a yard, and then scrambled to his feet, looking particularly vindictive.

"I'll get square with you for that!" he snarled, "and I'll tell my father you said he was a crook!"

"I didn't say he was a crook. I said my father was no more a crook than your father is. That's what I said, and I mean it, too."

"What else is your old man, when he set fire to my father's tavern, and will go to State prison for it, see if he doesn't?"

"Who says he set fire to the tavern?" demanded Joe.

"Everybody says so."

"That's a lie! Who saw him do it?"

"He took precious good care that no one seen him, but he done it, just the same."

"If no one saw him do the deed, then there is no evidence against him, and nobody has any right to accuse him of such a crime."

"There is evidence against him."

"What is it?" asked Joe, with a sinking heart.

"You'll find out when he's arrested."

"Who's going to arrest him?"

"Constable Jones, of course, if he ain't done it already."

"It would be an outrage to arrest him on a trumped-up charge, with my mother lying dead in the house!"

"What difference does that make? You ought to be glad she's passed in her chips, for she'd only go on the county, like any other pauper!" sneered Job.

"Take care, Job Ralston!" cried Joe, advancing on him again. "If I go for you again, I'll pound the life out of you!"

"Don't you touch me!" said Job, retreating. "If you do, I'll hit you with this stick!"

"Then leave my mother out of your talk," replied Joe threateningly.

"Oh, shoot your old woman! Who wants to talk about her? She never was no good for nothin'!"

With a cry of rage, Joe fairly flew at his persecutor.

Job raised the stick and struck him a blow alongside the head.

The drunkard's son minded the blow no more than if it had been laid on by a wisp of straw, though it raised a red mark on his cheek.

He snatched the sapling out of young Ralston's hand, threw it into the bushes, and then gave him an upper-cut with his left fist in the jaw that made every tooth in his head rattle like a pair of castanets.

Before Job could do anything to defend himself, he followed up his attack with a punch in the eye that made the bully cry out with pain and terror.

Then it was biff! swat! smash!

Every blow landed like a pile-driver on the face of the young rascal, and he fell all over himself, crying out:

"Help—Sam!—help! He's murderin' me! Help! Help!"

CHAPTER V.

FACING THE WORLD.

Sam Parker felt as if it was time for him to chip in, though he didn't like the look on Joe Benton's face.

He knew that his companion had provoked the trouble, and that he wasn't getting any more than he deserved.

Still it was his duty to try and save Job from the consequences of his nasty disposition, so he stepped forward and said, in a conciliatory tone:

"Oh, come, now, Joe Benton, let up on him! You've hit him enough!"

"Don't you interfere, Sam Parker," replied Joe, turning on him, "unless you want some of the same medicine! You heard what he said about my mother and father! Suppose you were in my shoes—would you stand for it?"

"Well, you've licked him for it—what more do you want? If you hurt him, you'll get into trouble, for his father will make things hot for you."

"I'm not afraid of his father," replied Joe. "He's done harm enough to us already by making a drunkard of my father. I have a very small opinion of a man who will make a practice of selling liquor to an unfortunate person cursed with the taste for it. Get up!" he added to Job. "Keep your mouth shut, and I'll let you alone; but if you dare utter another slander against either my dead mother or my father, I'll half kill you, if I go to the lock-up for it!"

Thus speaking, Joe hauled off, and Sam assisted his companion on to his feet.

"Why didn't you help me?" whined Job to Sam. "The two of us could have licked the stuffin' out of him."

"Oh, cut it out and come on! You can get square with him another time."

"You can bet your life I'll get square with him, if I die for it!" said Joe, with a malevolent glance at the boy he hated.

Sam grabbed him by the arm and hauled him away, and soon their retreating footsteps died away in the wood.

Joe watched them till they disappeared, then he started off in the direction of the cottage.

The question that worried him was how to prevent his mother from being buried as a common pauper.

He was ready to mortgage his services for a year or more, if, by so doing, he could secure her respectable burial, like a Christian.

On his return he found that his mother had been washed and laid out, in readiness for the undertaker, and he told his trouble to the Widow Cameron.

She advised him to call on the undertaker and have a talk with him.

She further told Joe that she would loan him enough money to see him through if the undertaker would not voluntarily help him out.

The boy thanked her gratefully, and assured her that he would, in time, pay her back every cent that she advanced.

He found that his father was still asleep, and yet ignorant of his wife's death.

What he would say or do when he learned the truth, Joe had not the slightest idea, but could only hope that he would behave himself, for the time being, at least.

He had some fear, after what Job Ralston had said about there being evidence against his father, that his parent might be taken into custody at any moment.

He tried to comfort himself with the reflection that Job had been merely bluffing, for though he felt certain that his father was guilty of the crime, yet he had no wish to see him suffer for it.

In one way, it seemed like an act of just retribution that Ralston's rum shop had gone up in smoke, as he had largely assisted Ike Horton in making a wreck of his father, and had since encouraged the unfortunate man to spend all the money he could scrape together at his vile tavern.

As the village undertaker wouldn't listen to Joe Benton, except on a spot cash basis, he had to fall back on the Widow Cameron, who loaned him $100, to be repaid at his convenience, she said.

The funeral took place on the afternoon of the day following Mrs. Benton's death, and was attended by about a dozen people.

Joe assumed the place of chief mourner, although his father was present and perfectly sober.

William Benton seemed to realize that the death of his wife was going to make a whole lot of difference in his mode of life.

He had little to say, and his sullen demeanor did not invite sociability, while his conduct toward his wife for two or three years before her death prevented him from being the recipient of much sympathy.

When father and son returned home after the funeral, Joe asked his parent what he was going to do.

Benton said he was going to sell out the personal property and leave the village.

"The greater part of the money realized ought to go to Mrs. Cameron," said Joe, "for she advanced the cost of the funeral and the price of the grave, and thus saved mother from being buried like a pauper."

"I need the money myself!" growled Benton. "I've got to live. Widow Cameron has got plenty of money, and don't need it."

"That makes no difference. She ought to get her money back as soon as possible, and I'm going to see that she does. I'm entitled to half of what the stuff brings, and I'll give her that on account. The balance I intend to earn, and pay her as I make it, until the debt is squared."

Benton said nothing.

He did not intend to give his son half, if he could help it, and he thought he could.

On the following morning, while they were at breakfast, Constable Jones arrived at the house, and arrested Benton on the charge of having fired the tavern and roadhouse.

The man was knocked all of a heap, for he had begun to flatter himself that he was safely out of the trouble.

"I didn't set fire to the place," he protested nervously. "I can prove that I was home in bed all night. Joe will swear to that fact."

Joe said nothing.

He felt that he was in a bad position.

He saw that his father expected him to take oath that he (Benton) was in bed at the cottage at the hour the fire occurred, and the boy knew that he couldn't swear to a lie, even to save his father, much as he desired to shield him from the consequences of the crime.

Benton was taken to the lock-up, and an hour or two later was brought up for examination before Justice Cox.

The magistrate's office was crowded with curiously disposed villagers, who were more or less inclined to believe the drunkard of the village guilty.

Ralston, the tavern keeper, appeared to prosecute the prisoner.

He testified as to the time when, for good and sufficient reasons, he had ejected the man from his barroom, and told how Benton had stood in the road and threatened to get back at him for being put out.

He said the fire happened something like an hour later, and he advanced many reasons, of a circumstantial nature, which caused him to believe that William Benton was the incendiary.

Benton, in his own defence, attempted to prove an alibi or bed, aimed at his son, but Joe refused to swear that his father was in the house at the time he said he was, whereupon Benton abused his son in a savage manner, and hurt his case so badly that he was held for trial by the justice.

Although there was scarcely any one among the villagers but believed the man guilty, it was considered doubtful if he had any kind of a clever lawyer to defend him.

He was removed that afternoon to the county jail in Exeter, and there we shall leave him to meet his fate at the next session of the Circuit Court.

His father out of the way, Joe took upon himself to sell the personal property in the cottage to liquidate, as far as possible, the funeral expenses of his mother.

After turning most of the money thus received over to the Widow Cameron, Joe made several fruitless attempts to get work, either in the village or in the neighborhood.

Finding that conditions were against him, he decided to go to Buffalo, and see if he could get a job there.

Accordingly, he packed his modest grip, and, after taking leave of all his friends and acquaintances, he started to walk to the big railroad town at the head of Lake Erie.

He had a long walk ahead of him, but as he was a sturdy and resolute boy, he did not feel the least bit discouraged by the prospect ahead of him.

He was ready to face the world and carve out his own future, confident that success would eventually come to him.

He started out early in the morning, after having partaken of a good breakfast at the home of the kindly disposed Widow Cameron, who wished him every success on his journey, and begged him to write to her at his earliest chance, as she didn't want to lose track of him entirely.

He carried a few dollars in silver in his grip, to meet the more pressing expenses of his trip, and with the sunshine in his face he walked out of Glenwood village, bound for Buffalo.

By noon he had covered twelve miles, and stopped at a farmhouse for dinner.

He offered to pay for the meal, but the farmer declined to accept pay from him.

Things went well with him for several days, and he had traveled about 100 miles, when he ran afoul of hard luck.

On the afternoon of the fourth day, as he was passing a tumbledown building close to the roadside, four hard-looking tramps issued from it and held him up.

One was a stout ruffian, who had the appearance of being a typical tramp; another, tall and thin in stature, looked like a very common crook, while the other two seemed to be a combination of all that was unsavory.

"Where are yer bound?" demanded the fat scoundrel.

"Buffalo," replied Joe, drawing back in distaste for their company.

"Yer never kin walk so far with sich a heavy valise," grinned fatty. "Here, chappies!" he said, snatching it from the boy's hand, "see if yer can't make it light enough for him to carry."

While two of the tramps busied themselves emptying Joe Benton's valise, the thin ruffian compelled the boy to exchange clothes with him, while the stout rascal appropriated his derby.

"Now skip!" cried the latter menacingly, pointing down the road.

Joe knew better than to enter into any argument with the rascals.

They had him where the hair was short, and he found it prudent to say nothing and saw wood.

Looking much the worse for his encounter with the rascals, he started off in the direction he had been instructed.

CHAPTER VI.

A HOSPITABLE WELCOME.

Joe, as he walked off down the road, felt that he cut a sorry figure in the cast-off garments of the thin rascal who had appropriated his coat and trousers.

"I'll be pulled in for a tramp at the first village I strike," he muttered disconsolately, as he stooped to turn up the trouser legs, that were several inches too long for him. "Talk about hard luck! I think this is simply fierce! It's bad enough to have to walk all the way to Buffalo; but to be robbed of the little money and the few clothes I brought along is rubbing things in with a vengeance. I feel like a fish out of water in this scarecrow suit. I haven't worn clothes for a long time that were any too good, but they were not ragged; they passed in a crowd. Now I feel like hiding in the bushes if any person was to come along."

Poor Joe continued to tramp along the lonely road till it grew dark; then lights began to twinkle at long intervals across the landscape, denoting the presence of farmhouses here and there.

He was now both tired and hungry.

Heretofore it had been his practice to walk up to a conveniently located farmhouse and offer to pay for a meal or a night's lodging, explaining that he was walking to Buffalo in order to save money, of which he admitted that he did not have a great deal.

In no case had he been turned away, as his frank, open countenance inspired confidence, and up to this point he had not been charged a cent.

Two or three farmers let him do a few chores in return for his dinner or a bed, but in most cases he was not required to contribute anything.

Now he felt ashamed to approach a hospitable farmer, for he had no money to offer, and he felt that his personal appearance would arouse suspicion and result in a turn-down.

So, famished and weary, he continued his walk, a prey to the gloomiest thoughts.

The immediate future had lost its encouraging, roseate hues.

Like Christian, in Pilgrim's Progress, he was walking in the valley of the shadow, and he did not know how to extricate himself from his difficulties.

As the evening grew apace, he saw the lights of a village, or a small town, far ahead to the left.

The road swung away to the right, and it looked like a long walk to reach the place unless he took to the wood on the left, which seemed to offer a short cut.

He decided to leave the road and save a mile or two.

It was the spring of the year, and the trees were only just beginning to awake from their winter sleep.

The wood, after he had got well into it, seemed frightfully still.

The white, ghostly moon, sifting through the bare branches that hung solemn and silent in the calm night air, poured a soft, weird light all around him, and threw the gaunt-looking shadows out into bold relief.

The only sound that came to his ears was the rustle of his shoes upon the old dead leaves.

He felt more lonely and desolate than ever.

His mother was dead.

His father the inmate of a cell in the Exeter county jail, held on a serious charge.

Himself a homeless wanderer, journeying to a large city, where his luck might prove to be the opposite of what he expected.

What wonder was it, at that lone hour, in the solitude of the wood, the most impressive of all solitudes, that Joe Benton, for the first time in his life, began to feel nervous and fanciful?

He began to regret that he had not kept to the road, for there he could see the lights, which were a kind of company for him.

But he could not go back now.

He must keep on, and so he screwed up his courage as well as he could and stepped bravely forward, though more than once he paused in dismay at the sight of the moonbeams shining on a scarred tree-trunk, causing it to resemble some ghostly object waiting in his path to waylay him.

He tried to whistle some familiar air, but the sound died on his lips, for his heart was not in it.

At length, through a break in the wood, he saw the road once more, and between it and the trees a large mansion and well-kept grounds—the residence of some well-to-do resident of that locality.

The sight of a human habitation, and the moonlit landscape beyond, revived Joe's courage, and he felt like himself again.

He heard the bark of a dog, and saw lights in the rear addition of a dwelling, which he took to be the kitchen.

Leaning against a tree, he wondered if he dare approach the house and ask for something to eat.

Ordinarily, he would hardly have taken the risk in his present unsavory outfit, but he was so desperately hungry that he could not resist the temptation.

So he made his way across a barren field to the yard surrounded by barns and outhouses, and was aiming for the back door, when he was suddenly confronted by the watch-dog, who was loose.

The animal looked ugly, and seemed inclined to spring at him, so Joe stopped, undecided whether to advance or retreat, either of which movements was likely to be attended with danger.

While facing this dilemma, the kitchen door was opened and a pretty young girl stepped out into the yard with a shallow pan in her hand.

"Here, Tige!" she called. "Come here, good boy! Tige! Tige! Where are you?"

The animal, who was accustomed to answer the first sound of his young mistress's voice, was unresponsive now.

His whole attention was concentrated on Joe, whom he regarded with suspicion and enmity.

"Here, Tige! Tige!" called the girl, as she advanced into the yard. "Where—"

She stopped suddenly on seeing the trampish figure of the boy standing at bay near the carriage house, with Tige crouching before him, within springing distance, in a menacing way.

"Who's there?" she asked, feeling as if she wanted to draw back, yet conscious that she was safe in the presence of the dog.

"Will you call the dog off, please?" asked Joe pleadingly.

The intruder's voice did not seem to fit well with his wretched-looking attire.

It was not the voice of a rough, uncultured boy.

There was an honest, manly ring to it that impressed the girl favorably.

She walked right up beside the dog, who began to growl and exhibit unmistakable signs of uneasiness at the presence of his mistress.

"Stop, Tige!" she said sharply, and the animal subsided, but his watchful eyes never left the boy for an instant. "Who are you, and what are you doing here?" she asked Joe, in a tone that was not unfriendly.

"My name is Joe Benton, miss. I am walking from the village of Glenwood, Blank County, to Buffalo."

"Buffalo!" she ejaculated. "That's some distance from here!"

"Yes, miss. This afternoon I was waylaid by four tramps along the road. They robbed me of my valise, containing the little money and few things I possessed, and one of them compelled me to exchange clothes with him. I know I look like a wreck, but I can't help it. I am tired and almost starving. I would like to get something to eat. If you will let me have it I'll go back to the wood and sleep there until morning, when I will keep on to the place I saw somewhere ahead when I left the road."

There was a note of sincerity and forlorn appeal in Joe's voice that touched the girl.

She walked up closer to the boy, the dog following, with a growl of displeasure at what he probably considered her temerity.

The girl studied Joe's face a moment in the moonlight.

What she saw there convinced her that he spoke the truth—that he was an honest, needy boy, whose necessities it were a charity to relieve.

"Come with me," she said. "You shall have all you can eat. Here, Tige," turning to the dog, "are a few dainties for you."

She placed the pan on the ground, under the animal's nose, but Tige disregarded the delicacies and followed the girl and Joe as far as the kitchen door; then, considering that he had performed his duty as far as he was able, he returned to the pan.

The girl led Joe into the kitchen, and gave some instructions to the cook, after which she disappeared.

The cook placed a bountiful supply of meat, bread, and other edibles before the wanderer, and he ate like a starved boy.

He learned that the young lady's name was Grace Fuller, and that she was the daughter of the owner of the house, who was president of the Corinth Bank, in the adjacent town.

Mr. Fuller and his wife had been unexpectedly called away that afternoon to the home of Mrs. Fuller's sister, in the town of Tamrack, fifteen miles away, who was critically ill, leaving the house of Grace, the gardener-coachman, and three women servants.

After Joe had eaten as much as he wanted, Miss Grace reappeared and had a talk with him.

She was so satisfied that he was an honest, deserving boy that she gave him a $10 bill with which to purchase a cheap suit in town on the morrow and help him on his way.

Then she called the gardener and told him to provide Joe with sleeping quarters in the barn for the night, and instructed the cook to give him his breakfast in the morning.

Joe expressed his gratitude to the young lady, bade her good-night, and followed the gardener to the barn.

"You can turn in on that pile of hay," said the gardener, pointing at a hillock on the ground floor, under a barred open window overlooking the field in the rear. "I'll have to lock you in, but the door will be open at six o'clock in the morning, which will be time enough for you, as the cook won't be ready to give you your breakfast before seven."

The man withdrew; then the boy threw himself upon the pile of hay and was asleep in five minutes.

CHAPTER VII.

A STARTLING DISCOVERY.

About two in the morning, Joe awoke with a start.

He had had an unpleasant dream, in which the four tramps who waylaid him figured prominently.

He thought they were trying to break into a room where he was sleeping, and the sensation was not a pleasant one.

"So it was only a dream," he muttered, sitting up and wiping the perspiration from his forehead. "It was awfully real. I could see the fat fellow and the thin chap looking in at the window, with the moonlight shining on their faces. They looked ugly enough to commit murder, almost. It's funny that I should have such a realistic dream about them; but I suppose it was because they did me up in such a sharp way. I'm glad it was only a dream. I don't want to meet those chaps again."

At that moment he fancied that he heard voices outside the barred window.

He listened intently, and in a moment or two was certain he heard the low tones of two or more men who appeared to be standing under the window.

"Who can that be?" breathed Joe uneasily. "I wonder what time it is?"

There was a small step-ladder standing near by.

He left the hay, moved the step-ladder directly under the window, and was about to mount it when he heard a scraping sound against the side of the barn, and presently the rays of moonlight shining through the window were partially obscured by a dark object.

Joe looked up and saw the wicked-looking countenance of the stout tramp pressed against the bars, evidently investigating the interior of the barn.

The boy's heart nearly stopped beating, for the situation was almost a counterpart of his dream.

It gave him quite a shock to see that ruffian's face gazing in through the bars, which, however, looked solid enough to keep such a rascal on the other side.

Joe stood back in the shadows, where he couldn't very well be seen by the man at the window, but, nevertheless, he didn't feel easy until the face was withdrawn, and he heard the scraping sound again as he dropped back to the ground.

The boy waited to see if any other face would appear at the window, and finding that none did, he crept up the ladder and peered out.

Right under the opening stood the four tramps who had held him up.

They were talking together, and Joe gathered from their conversation that they were figuring on breaking into the mansion close by and securing such plunder as they could get their hands on.

"The rascals!" said the boy to himself. "Something must be done to prevent them carrying out their project. It's lucky I've got on to their purpose. The question is: How am I to get out of this barn in order to warn the people in the house, for I'm locked in, and the bars across this window keep me in as effectually as they keep any one on the outside from breaking in? It's my duty to see if I can't do something, for Miss Fuller has been very kind to me, and the least I can do is to make an effort to save her father's property."

While Joe was considering the situation a fifth man appeared on the scene.

He came from the direction of the house.

He was a tall, well-built fellow, with bushy whiskers.

As the moonlight shone in his face Joe gave a start of surprise.

He recognized him as Ike Horton, the man who had made a drunkard of his father.

The other ruffians were evidently waiting for him, for they gathered about him as soon as he came up.

"Well, Ike," said the stout man, "what did yer find out?"

"All I wanted to know. The windows on the ground floor are all protected by steel shutters, barred on the inside. We haven't any tools to force them."

"How about the doors? Don't you think a jimmy will whistle the back one open?"

"Easily; but I'm thinkin' we'll find an iron one on the other side, judging by the shutters."

"Then we'll have to hunt up a ladder, or find something else that will give us a chance at one of the second-story windows," growled the stout man.

"No; there's a better and easier way of gettin' in than that," replied Horton.

"Let's hear about it, then."

"The bars protectin' one of the cellar windows are a bit loose in their sockets. We can easily force them out. The window itself is not locked."

"Good! But in any case a jimmy would force it in the twist of a lamb's tail."

"The opening is large enough to admit the whole of us, one by one. Once inside, we'll have a clean sweep, unless the cellar door is of iron and heavily bolted. One of us can investigate that first of all. If we can't get through it, then we'll have to try for a second-story window."

"What hour is it?" asked the thin one, who wore Joe's jacket and trousers, though the latter were much too short for him.

"About two," replied Horton.

"Time we got down to business," said the stout man.

Horton, who appeared to be the leading spirit of the enterprise, nodded.

"Cuss this moonshine!" remarked the thin chap. "It shows a person up so. I'd like to put it out of business."

"The moon will be down before we're through with the job," said Horton. "Come on!"

The five men walked off around the barn, leaving Joe to figure out how he was going to get out of the building and put a stop to the rascals' game.

First of all, he tried the stout iron bars at his side.

He did it mechanically, because he knew in his heart that they were too solidly fixed to be removed by him.

He was right, and descended the step-ladder.

Then he walked to the big door which the gardener had locked upon him.

The moonlight shone full upon the stout lock, and he knew that, too, was a barrier he could not pass.

Next he looked around in the semi-obscurity of the big room, and saw a stairway leading to the upper floor.

He made his way up the stairs, and through the opening in the floor, into a dark loft.

A thin ray of moonlight shone through a crack in one side of the place.

That misty sheen of light attracted him, and he found himself standing before a barred shutter.

It was a stout wooden bar, set in a pair of staples, and was easily removed.

Catching hold of an iron ring that his fingers encountered, he pulled on it, and the shutter swung open with a creak, revealing an opening fifteen or twenty feet from the ground.

The way of egress from the barn was before him, for a drop of fifteen feet is not so much for an agile, resolute boy.

Inside of two minutes he was picking himself up from the ground, a bit shaken by the fall.

He ran to the end of the barn around which the men had vanished, and peered cautiously in the direction of the mansion.

He saw four of the rascals squatting on the grass against the side of the building—two on either side of one of the cellar windows.

Joe, after what he had heard Horton say, concluded that this window had been forced, and that Horton himself was now in the cellar, for he was not outside with the others.

Presently he saw the men bend their heads toward the opening, then one got on his hands and knees, and entered the window backward.

As soon as he disappeared the others followed him, one by one.

"Now what shall I do?" Joe asked himself. "How shall I give the alarm so as to have some of the rascals caught in the act? I wonder where the gardener sleeps? If I could find out, and arouse him, there would be two of us against them."

He walked out into the yard where the moonlight was cut off by the shadows cast by the outbuildings.

The carriage house and stable combined adjoined the barn.

It consisted of two stories, the windows of the upper floor being set off by curtains, indicating that it might be a bedroom.

A narrow entrance alongside of the big double doors indicated the way by which the second floor was reached.

Joe noticed that there was a push-button in the door-post near the knob.

He jumped to the conclusion that the gardener slept upstairs in the room where the curtains were.

To test the matter he pushed the button, which he guessed connected with a bell or gong in the room above.

He held his finger on it, and in a few moments he heard one of the windows pushed up, a man's head was thrust out, and a voice, which he recognized as that of the gardener, inquired who was there.

"Me," replied Joe.

"And who are you?" asked the puzzled gardener.

"Joe Benton, the boy you locked in the barn."

"The dickens!" ejaculated the surprised man. "How did you get out, and what do you want?"

"I got out by an opening in the loft."

"What did you do that for?"

"Put on your clothes quick, and come down!"

"Why, what's wrong?"

"There are thieves in the house, and we want to do something about catching them."

"Thieves in the house!" gasped the gardener in astonishment.

"Yes. Come down and let me in, and I'll tell you all about it while you're dressing."

The earnest ring of Joe's voice told the man that something was clearly wrong, so he shut down the window, ran down the narrow flight of stairs, and admitted Joe.

CHAPTER VIII.

FACING THE BURGLARS.

By the time the gardener was dressed he had learned all about the presence of the five rascals, and how they had forced their way into the mansion by way of one of the cellar windows.

"The question is, how can the two of us put a spoke in their wheels?" said Joe. "There are five pretty tough roosters to handle, and the chances are they carry either revolvers or knives. I guess if they have weapons they won't hesitate to use them. Have you got a gun?"

"Yes, I've got a revolver," and the gardener took it from under the head of his bed. "If we could reach Mr. Fuller's library without their knowledge I could send word to the Corinth police over the private telephone wire; but as you say there are five of the rascals in the house. I'm afraid we never would be able to do the trick."

"We've got to do something," said Joe, in a resolute tone. "They mustn't be allowed to rob the place if we can manage in any way to prevent them."

"It's a pity that Mr. Fuller is away from home," said the gardener, in an undecided way.

Joe could see that the man was not very anxious to face five determined burglars, who might be armed.

"Give me your revolver," said Joe, "and I will enter the house first, by way of the cellar. We will see if we can make our way to the library. If we can, I will try and hold the rascals off while you telephone."

The gardener consented to this arrangement, though it was clear that he did not relish the job.

They crossed the yard stealthily to the cellar window, from which they saw that the bars had been torn off.

Joe wriggled himself down into the cellar, and the gardener followed him.

The place was quite dark, and unfamiliar to the boy, but the gardener showed him the way to the stairs.

Holding the revolver in readiness for instant action, Joe tiptoed his way up to the ground floor, and found himself standing in the gloom of a small entry leading to the butler's pantry and kitchen.

"Where is the library?" whispered the boy.

"It's a small room on this floor, connecting with the parlor and the front hall."

They listened intently for sounds that would enable them to locate the present whereabouts of the burglars.

For a few moments they heard nothing suspicious, then muffled noises came from a room which the gardener said was the dining-room.

Joe sneaked over to the door opening on the main hall, and listened.

The gardener stood close behind him, and listened also.

"Some of them are in the dining-room and the sitting-room, and there is one or more in the parlor. We can't reach the telephone without being discovered," he said.

"Then we must wait till they go upstairs," said Joe.

So they waited as patiently as they could, listening all the while to the sounds made by the rascals, who were gathering up whatever they could find of value downstairs that they could carry away.

The parlor was full of small articles of more or less value, and these the five rascals were making up into small bundles for easy handling.

There were also many articles of fine plated ware in the dining-room that the burglars considered worth appropriating, and many expensive knick-knacks in the sitting-room.

They could see the dark figures of a couple of the rascals crossing the wide and dimly lighted hall, from the sitting-room to the parlor, and back again.

At length, after bringing all the plunder they had collected in the parlor and library into the sitting-room, three of the chaps mounted the stairs as softly as shadows.

"Now," said Joe, "can you reach the library through that door?"

"If it isn't locked I can," answered the gardener.

"Try it. Be careful not to make any noise, for two of the rascals are down here, probably busy with the collected plunder in the sitting-room, the door of which on the hall is open. The parlor door is probably open, too. Before you use the telephone sneak around and close the door, or the bell and what you say into the transmitter may reach the ears of the two fellows down here."

"What are you going to do?" asked the gardener.

"I'm going to stand watch here. If one or both of those rascals should come into the hall and start to enter the parlor again I'll hold them up."

The gardener softly crossed to the closed door of the library, tried the knob, and found that the door yielded to his touch.

He disappeared inside, closing the door after him.

As Joe stood by the hall entrance he could easily hear sounds of low conversation and the rattle of articles being packed up in the sitting-room.

Suddenly a shriek rang out through the house.

"My gracious!" exclaimed Joe. "That must be Miss Fuller. She's been aroused by those rascals upstairs, and they may do her an injury."

A second cry, but a muffled one, followed, and Joe feared they had got hold of the girl and were trying to intimidate her to keep quiet.

Of course her first shrill outcry was sure to awaken the two female servants who slept in the top of the back part of the house, and he looked for trouble.

The gratitude he felt toward Miss Fuller for her hospitality to him aroused a strong impulse on his part to go to her aid, in spite of the odds he would be compelled to face.

The gardener had told him that the back stairway in the entry leading to a landing above offered communication with the front of the second floor by way of a door.

Joe, remembering this, left his post at the rear of the main hall and ran up the back stairs.

Arrived at the landing, he heard a door open on the third floor, and concluded that one or both of the servants had come out of their rooms to find out the cause of the disturbance.

There was a door on his right and another on his left.

He opened one and found it led into an unoccupied bedroom.

Muffled sounds came from the chamber in front of it.

Joe opened a door in that direction, and found himself in a handsome tiled bathroom.

There was a door opposite, through which the sounds came quite plainly to him.

He knew the trouble was taking place in that room, and nerving himself for the encounter he was about to face, he opened the door and walked in, revolver in hand.

He was now in Grace Fuller's bedroom.

The girl was in bed, staring up, in a frightened way, into the masked face of the man with the bushy whiskers, whom Joe knew to be Ike Horton.

He held a pointed revolver at her head, while the thin rascal, the one who wore Joe's clothes, was hastily rummaging the dresser for articles of value.

Joe took in the situation at a glance, and without wasting a second in addressing the two crooks, he fired straight at Horton's arm.

Simultaneously with the stunning crack of the weapon Horton uttered a cry of pain, and his revolver dropped from his nerveless grasp onto the bed.

Grace's terrified gaze wandered to the spot where Joe stood, in all his ragged make-up, and she recognized the boy; but not for some moments did she comprehend that he had come to her aid.

The thin rascal turned around, startled by the report of the gun in Joe's hands, and the cry uttered by his companion.

"Throw up your hands, both of you!" cried the boy in a determined tone, "or I'll put a ball into you!"

"Oh, Lor'!" gasped the thin crook.

Horton uttered a fierce imprecation as he stood holding onto his wounded arm.

"Pick up that revolver, Miss Fuller," said Joe, "and cover one of those chaps."

The girl seemed too dazed, or too much frightened, to obey.

At that moment the stout scoundrel, who had been rummaging in the room on the opposite side of the front landing, peered into the chamber, with a drawn revolver in his hand.

Joe saw him and raised his weapon to intimidate him.

The rascal, taking things in at once, covered Joe with his revolver at the same moment.

To save himself the boy saw he'd have to fire.

Both weapons cracked together.

Joe felt a sting like the touch of a hot iron above his right ear, and for a moment it seemed as if the room was whirling around and around.

At the same time he heard a cry as from afar off.

The next thing he knew was the sensation of being pressed roughly against the wall of the room by some one who had a grip on his throat.

As his senses returned to him he saw that Horton had sprung upon him, and was holding him with his unwounded arm and the point of his knee.

The blood was running down his right cheek from the wound he had received from the stout man's revolver.

His own weapon lay on the floor at his feet.

As he started to struggle desperately with the man who held him pinned against the wall, Horton shouted to the thin chap:

"Come here, Simpson, and help me secure this young monkey!"

As the fellow started to obey, Grace Fuller seemed to wake up to the situation.

She snatched up the revolver that lay on the coverlet of her bed, aimed it at Horton, and pulled the trigger. Then she slipped into a wrapper.

The rascal uttered a groan, and, staggering away from Joe, fell upon the carpet and clutched wildly at the air.

The next instant the boy and Simpson were engaged in a desperate struggle for mastery, while Grace, with the smoking weapon in her hand, watched them with distended eyes, unable to shoot again for fear of hitting her young champion.

CHAPTER IX.

THE CAPTURE OF THE HOUSEBREAKERS.

Joe found that Simpson was strong and wiry, and rather more than he could handle successfully.

The rascal was not armed, and he was trying to do Joe up by sheer strength.

They rolled over and over on the carpet, Simpson sometimes on top, and sometimes Joe.

While the struggle was going on the gardener, who had succeeded in connecting with police headquarters at Corinth, and explaining the situation, was in a funk over the revolver reports upstairs, for he feared murder had been done by the burglars.

He had not the courage to go up to the second floor, unarmed as he was, for he felt that he would be placed completely at the mercy of the rascals, and might lose his life to no purpose.

He opened the library door and looked for Joe, but found that the boy had left his post at the rear hall door.

He judged that Joe had gone upstairs and tackled the burglars single-handed, firing at them and being shot at in return.

This was the only way he could account for the shooting, as he did not believe that the rascals would wantonly use their weapons on the women.

As none of the chaps came downstairs after the firing, it was his impression that the boy had been put out of business.

The two crooks who were packing the plunder downstairs in sections of table cloths they had torn into suitable lengths, stopped in their labors on hearing the shots.

It looked as if their pals had met with unexpected opposition on the floor above, and they hastened to provide an avenue for rapid retreat by throwing up one of the sitting-room windows and opening the steel shutters.

Then they went into the hall and listened.

They heard the muffled sounds of the struggle going on between Joe and Simpson in Miss Fuller's bedroom.

The true cause of the noise did not seem to occur to them.

They believed it was made by their companions moving around after having shot whoever had interfered with them, so they did not think it necessary to go upstairs to look around.

In their opinion, their three pals were well able to look out for themselves, and had they met with any serious setback they would have come downstairs in a hurry.

After listening, and hearing nothing to alarm them, they returned to their work in the sitting-room, expecting their associates to reappear at any moment with the plunder they had picked up above.

In the meantime the struggle between Simpson and Joe continued.

Whatever advantage there was rested with the thin crook. Grace watched them with an anxious eye, fully prepared to shoot and wound the burglar if she got a fair chance.

Had she been confident of her ability as a markswoman, she would have found many chances, but as it was, she was afraid to fire at Simpson lest she hit Joe.

Finally the boy, owing to loss of blood from his wound and the superior strength of his antagonist, began to succumb.

Simpson got him down on his back and held him there.

Then seeing the revolver on the floor, he reached for it, with the intention of stunning Joe with a clip on the head.

This gave Grace the opportunity she had been looking for.

Instead of shooting Simpson, which she might easily have done, she pluckily jumped forward and struck him alongside the head with her weapon.

The rascal fell over, partly stunned, and that gave Joe the chance to complete the good work.

He seized a towel that hung over the back of a chair, tore it into three strips, and tied Simpson's arms behind his back and his ankles together.

Then he looked at Ike Horton, who lay groaning with pain on the carpet.

There was no need of tying him, apparently, for he had a bullet through the upper part of his right arm and a wound in the side where Grace Fuller had shot him.

"We've got two of the rascals dead to rights, at any rate," said Joe to the girl. "I wonder if the others have skipped? If they have I don't see why the gardener doesn't come up here and investigate the shooting. He went into the library, downstairs, to telephone to the police in town, and must have heard the reports of the revolvers."

"How many of these men were in the house?" asked Grace. "There's another one lying over by the door."

"Is there?" replied Joe, in some surprise.

"Yes. You shot him when he fired at you."

"I hope I didn't kill him," said the boy, walking over and looking at the stout ruffian, who lay, unconscious, over the door-sill, with a red, bleeding furrow across one side of his forehead, where Joe's bullet had ploughed its way. "No, he's not dead," he added, glad of that fact, for it seemed a dreadful thing to him to take a human life, even in self-defense.

Then he told the girl that five burglars had entered the mansion through one of the cellar windows, and tied up the third burglar.

"The other two, who were packing up their plunder downstairs in the sitting-room, have, no doubt, got away before this. I'm going down to investigate and look up the gardener."

"You are a brave boy," said Grace, looking at him admiringly. "You have saved our house from being robbed, and you saved me from being frightened to death by that man who threatened me with his revolver."

"Well, I did the best I could under the circumstances; but if you had not shot the fellow yourself when he had me pinned against the wall, I don't think I could have done much. You're a plucky girl yourself, Miss Fuller."

"I shot him because I was afraid he and the other man intended to kill you, between them. But you are wounded! Let me wash the blood away and bind the cut up," she said, with anxious solicitude.

"Don't worry about me, Miss Fuller. I'll attend to that later. It doesn't bother me much, and there is no time to attend to it now. I must see if the rest of the crooks have gone. Let me have that revolver."

He took the weapon from her hand and walked softly downstairs.

As he stepped into the hall he saw the scared face of the gardener at the door of the library.

The man showed great surprise on seeing him, and beckoned him over, at the same time motioning toward the door of the sitting-room.

Joe understood from his pantomime that the other two rascals were still in the house—in the sitting-room.

This idea was confirmed as soon as he reached the gardener's side.

"What about that shooting upstairs?" asked the gardener eagerly. "I see you are wounded. Where are the three men who went upstairs?"

"Down and out," replied Joe.

"You don't mean it?" cried the man, astonished.

"I do. Why didn't you come up when you heard the firing? I would have been put out of business only for Miss Fuller, who shot one of the rascals when he had me dead to rights after I was shot myself. I laid out the fellow who fired at me, and Miss Fuller helped me get the best of the third chap. That girl showed a great deal more spunk in the emergency than you have. Did you 'phone the police?"

"Yes. They are on their way here."

"Good enough! Here! Take this gun of yours, and we'll hold up the two who are in the sitting-room. It's a wonder they didn't come upstairs and see what the shooting amounted to."

"They came as far as the sitting-room door and then went back again."

"You are sure they're in there, are you?"

"Yes. Can't you hear them talking?"

"I do now. Come on! Let us finish up this business."

Joe led the way to the door of the sitting-room, and then he and the gardener sprang into the room and covered the two crooks, who had finished their packing, and were impatiently waiting the return of their companions.

"Up with your hands!" cried Joe, sternly.

The rascals were taken entirely by surprise.

They were also unarmed, and were thus at the mercy of Joe and the gardener.

They made a break for the window, but Joe stopped them with the threat that he would shoot them down unless they gave in.

Seeing that they had no chance of escaping, they sullenly yielded.

Joe backed them up into a corner of the room, where he could easily keep his eyes and revolver on both, and then told the gardener to open the front door so that the police could enter when they arrived.

As soon as he had done this the boy sent him upstairs to stay with Grace, and keep watch on the knocked-out burglars there.

Inside of a quarter of an hour a light wagon drove up to the house with several policemen in it.

They walked right in, as the front door had been left open for them.

Joe called to them, and they came into the sitting-room and took charge of the two rascals the boy was guarding.

Two of them accompanied Joe upstairs to Grace's room.

The gardener was keeping watch in a chair in the middle of the room.

The stout ruffian had recovered his senses, but as Joe had taken the precaution to secure his arms he could do nothing.

The three burglars were carried downstairs.

The two wounded ones were immediately removed to the waiting wagon.

When the officers came back for the third, Joe told the policeman in charge of the squad that Simpson had his pants and coat on, and he wanted to recover them and give the rascal back his own tattered garments.

He explained to the officer how four of the men had held him up and robbed him on the road the previous afternoon.

Simpson sullenly admitted the truth of the boy's statement, and at the policeman's command he took off the stolen clothes and put on his own.

Joe also recovered his hat from the stout man.

The officers then carried off their prisoners, with the assurance of Grace that her father would be on hand to press the charge of housebreaking against the rascals as soon as he returned home and learned the particulars of the case.

The excitement being now over, Joe said he would return to the barn and finish his interrupted night's rest.

Grace would not hear of that, however.

"I could not think of letting you sleep in the barn after what you have done for us to-night. You must occupy the chamber back of this. John will take you there. You must not go away until my father has seen and thanked you for the service you have performed. I hope you understand that I am very grateful to you, and you may be sure that father and mother will appreciate your brave conduct, and reward you in a suitable manner," said the girl.

"I don't ask any reward, Miss Fuller," replied Joe. "You were very kind to give me food and shelter when I asked for it, and I am glad I had the opportunity to return the favor."

"What I gave you was but a small thing. The service you have rendered us is very important. You have probably saved several thousand dollars' worth of our property. That watch and jewelry of mine, alone, are easily worth $500, and I should have lost it all but for your courageous action."

The girl, who had noticed his suddenly improved personal appearance in some perplexity, asked him about it, and he told her that he had recovered his clothes from the rascal who had appropriated them the afternoon before.

"You look ever so much better," she answered, with a smile. Not at all like you did when I met you last night in the yard. Now, John," to the gardener, "take Mr. Benton to the guest chamber on this floor, and see that he has everything he needs for the night."

Joe bowed, and said good-night to the young lady of the house, and followed the man to the room in question.

To Joe's eyes the brass bed looked almost too nice for him to sleep in, but, nevertheless, after the gardener had retired, he was glad to undress and turn in, for he was conscious that he stood greatly in need of rest after his late exertions.

CHAPTER X.

THE RAILROAD ACCIDENT.

Joe didn't eat in the kitchen next morning, but in the dining-room, as the guest of Grace Fuller, who took special pains to let him know how much she appreciated his plucky conduct in connection with the capture of the burglars.

Early that morning she had got into communication with her father by telephone, and after learning what had happened Mr. Fuller told her that he would be home around ten o'clock.

While awaiting her father's arrival she devoted herself to entertaining Joe.

She made him feel as much at home as if he were one of her oldest friends, while he, on his part, tried to improve the favorable impression he had already made on her.

Banker Fuller drove up in his auto at a quarter past ten, and Grace introduced Joe to him as the lad who had saved their property and captured the five burglars.

He viewed the plunder the rascals had expected to carry off, and listened to the stories told by his daughter, Joe and the gardener.

He figured up that the boy had saved him a loss of several thousand dollars, and he hastened to assure Joe of his gratitude and the appreciation he felt for his valuable services.

It was necessary that Joe and the gardener should attend the examination of the housebreakers, in the court house at Corinth and give their testimony, so Mr. Fuller took them to town in his auto.

The evidence against the rascals was so conclusive that they were remanded for trial at the next term of the Circuit Court, when Joe would be required to appear as the chief witness against them.

This placed Joe in a rather peculiar predicament.

As he was a non-resident of the county, the judge would have caused his detention in town as a valuable witness but for Mr. Fuller, who guaranteed that the boy would be on hand when wanted.

After the examination was over, and they were on their way back to the banker's residence, Joe called Mr. Fuller's attention to the fact that he was a homeless boy, making his way to Buffalo, as best he could, in order to get a start in life there.

"I don't see how I can stay here until those men are tried, as I have practically no money, and no prospects of getting any right away. If I continue my walk to Buffalo, it is hard to say where I'll be six weeks from now, when the trial comes on. As you have guaranteed my presence here when wanted, I'll have to look to you for advice."

"You needn't worry about the money, Benton," replied the banker. "I'm going to make you a present of $1,000, to show my appreciation of your services to my daughter and to myself."

"One thousand dollars!" exclaimed Joe, to whom such a sum seemed like a mint of money. "I'd hardly know what to do with so much money."

"Why, I'd put it in a savings bank, wouldn't you, till you got to be twenty-one, at least?" said the banker.

"I suppose so, sir, if I didn't find a better use for it. Do you really mean to give me as much as that?"

"Certainly. You are entitled to that much."

"Then I won't need to do any more tramping. I can ride the balance of the way to Buffalo, just as well as not."

"You need not break into the thousand for that purpose. I will provide you with a railway ticket to your destination and a few dollars extra for your immediate expenses; but it will be necessary for you to remain here until after the trial, and I will see that that doesn't cost you a cent."

Joe was invited to remain at the Fuller household until after the trial of the housebreakers came off, and the arrangement suited him very well indeed.

Grace seemed to have taken a distinct liking for him, while he, on his side, was by no means indifferent to the many personal charms of the fair girl.

They often went to the town of Corinth together, and took frequent rides and walks about the neighborhood of the banker's home.

The more Grace saw of Joe the better she liked him, and it was just the same with Joe—he grew more interested in his fair companion the longer he was in her company.

The boy, however, maintained an almost complete reserve about his later life in Glenwood.

He said not a word about his father being a drunkard, and in prison, charged with a serious crime; nor about the way his surviving parent had practically sent his wife to the grave, owing to his heartless conduct.

He felt that such a confession would reflect more or less discredit on himself, notwithstanding that he was in no wise responsible for his father's actions.

The six weeks passed away all too quickly for Joe, and the trial of the burglars came on.

His testimony in the witness chair clinched their conviction, and they were sentenced to ten years each in the State prison.

On the morning that they were put aboard a train bound for Auburn, in charge of a small posse of officers, Joe, with a $1,000 draft on a Buffalo bank in his pocket, boarded the same train, bound for the Lake City, via Salamanca.

The prisoners were to change at Salamanca for a train going eastward, while Joe kept straight on northward to his destination.

His parting with Grace had been a rather tearful one on the girl's part, for she had come to think a great deal of the stalwart, manly lad, who was facing the world all by himself in his fight for fortune.

They arranged between themselves to write to each other, as neither wanted to lose track of the other.

Joe had also been provided by the banker with a couple of letters of introduction to business people of Buffalo, which stated that any favor accorded to the bearer would be duly appreciated by Mr. Fuller.

The young traveler occupied a seat in one of the day coaches, and his thoughts were about evenly divided between Grace Fuller and what the future had in store for him.

The train was rapidly approaching Salamanca when something happened.

Some defect in one of the trucks of the smoking-car caused the coach to jump the track.

In a moment the connection was broken with the baggage car directly ahead, and the smoker tilted over and struck a long sliding switch, completely demolishing it.

The switch lever being pushed over, opened the siding where a heavy freight train was stalled until it could take the main track.

The smoker, pushed along by the fifty-mile-an-hour momentum of the passenger coaches and Pullman drawing-room cars behind, turned into the siding and went bumping over the sleepers toward the freight train, only a hundred feet away.

In a brief fraction of time, before any one on the train realized that an accident had happened, the smoker crashed into the caboose of the freight and smashed the little car as flat as a pancake.

The concussion with the heavy freight turned the smoker over on its side, and the day coach immediately behind it partially telescoped it, and then mounted the wreck like a horse taking a hurdle.

The second day coach, in which Joe was seated, butted into the rear of it, tearing the platform and part of the car to pieces, and throwing its own passengers about in all directions.

The heavy Pullmans crowded against this car and did considerable damage to it.

The thirty-odd box and platform cars of the freight ahead, together with its powerful locomotive and tender, were pushed on and jumped together in a way productive of much injury to the rolling stock and their contents.

The whole thing happened inside of a few seconds, and as the unhurt but badly demoralized passengers poured out of the cars as fast as they could the sight presented to their eyes was not a reassuring one.

Among those who escaped scot free, though much shaken up, was Joe Benton.

The shock had thrown him from his seat over the back of the one directly in front, and knocked the breath out of his body.

Many of the people in the car had been more or less injured from being flung about, and their cries and moans echoed through the coach.

The casualties in the coach ahead were much larger, and of a more serious nature, while in the smashed smoker they were appalling.

When Joe pulled himself together he gazed around the car like one awakening from a bad dream.

The excited people were trying to extricate themselves and their friends from the coach.

A pandemonium of terror seemed to have broken loose.

He soon realized the situation, and his first thought was to assist any of his fellow travelers who needed aid.

He carried a little old lady from the car, first of all, and then went back and helped her aged companion, a white-haired old man, to alight.

Neither had suffered any material injury.

The coach now being emptied, Joe mingled with the crowd that was helping the passengers out of the forward coach, which was tilted up at an angle of thirty degrees or so, its forward trucks resting on the smashed roof of the smoker.

Several dead and dying persons were taken from this car and many badly injured ones.

The wreck of the smoker was a fearful one to look at.

Frantic efforts were being made to get out those of its surviving occupants, and Joe took a leading part in this sad duty, though the sights he saw turned his heart sick.

Among the dead and fatally injured he recognized two of the prisoners en route for Auburn, and their guards.

He looked around for like Horton, Simpson, and the stout rascal, whose name he had learned was Coates.

To his surprise, there was no sign of those rascals, either among the dead, the injured, or those few who had miraculously escaped.

Of the five guards who had accompanied the prisoners, three were dead and the other two were badly hurt.

"Can it be that those rascals escaped all injury and then got away from here in the confusion?" Joe asked himself.

CHAPTER XI.

THE NEW NIGHT WATCHMAN OF DOCK A.

Joe knew that the Fullers would hear of the railroad accident probably before night, and that Grace would be very anxious to learn how he had come out of it.

As soon as the train pulled into the depot he sent the following telegram to Mr. Fuller:

SALAMANCA, N. Y., June 6.

GEORGE FULLER, CORINTH BANK, CORINTH, N. Y.

We had had smash-up on road, ten miles south of Salamanca. Several dead and many hurt. Ike Horton, Simpson and Coates escaped in confusion. Other two dead. I am all right.

JOE BENTON.

The dead were removed to the city morgue, pending identification, while the badly wounded were carried to the hospital.

When the train finally continued on to Buffalo Joe went with it.

He reached the Lake City late in the afternoon and went to a moderate-priced hotel.

Next morning he presented one of his letters of introduction to the head of the shipping firm of Walker & Co., whose offices were on the lake front.

Mr. Walker promised to find an opening for him in his establishment in a few days, and the boy thanked him.

He showed the gentleman the draft he had on the Buffalo bank, and asked him if he would help him to cash it.

One of the office clerks was deputed to take him to the bank, identify him, and after Joe received the money, guide him to a good savings bank, where he could open an account.

When this matter had been settled Joe started out to look up a cheap furnished room for himself.

He had no great difficulty in finding a place which he considered suitable for his means.

It was not far from the lake front, and within easy walking distance of the business house where he expected soon to be employed.

Joe called next day at the office of Walker & Co. and left his address.

Two days later he was sent for.

"The best thing I can offer you at present, Benton, is the post of watchman at our coal dock, foot of Jay street, on the Buffalo River," said Mr. Walker, when Joe had been ushered into his office. "It's a night job."

"All right," replied the boy. "I don't care what the position is as long as I get a start at something."

"Very well," answered the head of the establishment, pleased at the boy's readiness to accept employment, even if it happened to be uncongenial. "I will send one of my clerks with you presently, to show you the dock and introduce you to the day man you relieve. I shall want you to start in to-night, as the other watchman has been discharged for habitual drunkenness."

"I am ready to begin at once, sir," replied Joe promptly.

"I am bound to say that I like your energetic ways, Benton, and you may rest assured that this position is merely a stepping-stone to something better. I shall keep you in mind, and as soon as a better opening offers you shall be advanced."

"Thank you, sir."

Mr. Walker then sent for a certain clerk.

"This is Joseph Benton, Harper. Take him over to Dock A and make him known to Adams. He will fill in there as night watchman till further notice."

The clerk bowed and then motioned Joe to follow him.

"So you're going to stand the night watch on Dock A, are you?" said Harper, after they were started on their way.

"So Mr. Walker says," answered Joe.

"You're a stranger in Buffalo, aren't you?"

"I am."

"Where do you hail from?"

"Glenwood, Blank County, New York."

"Country town, I suppose?"

"Hardly a town. It's a village."

"Tired of the country, and came to Buffalo to see a little of life, eh?" grinned Harper.

"I came to this city because there was no chance around Glenwood for me to get on."

"What did you do there? Work in a store, or on a farm?"

"I did more farm work than anything else."

"How came you to apply at our firm for work?"

"Brought a letter of introduction to Mr. Walker from Mr. Fuller of Corinth."

"This is a pretty tough job the boss is giving you—night watchman on Dock A."

"Oh, I guess I can stand it all right. When a fellow is looking for a position he can't always select what pleases him best. I understand it's only temporary, anyway. Something to keep me out of mischief till a better job turns up."

"I hope you have plenty of nerve," said Harper, looking at him critically.

"Why?"

"Dock A is in a tough quarter of the town, and you're liable to be up against some tough roosters who hang around that neighborhood. If they took the notion to drop you into the river on a dark night they'd be apt to do it, unless you kept your weather eye lifting, and was as nimble as a young monkey."

"That so? Are they in the habit of playing such games as that?"

"They're in the habit of doing pretty much as they please."

"Don't the police ever interfere with such amusements?"

"The cops stationed in that neighborhood know better than to butt in on those chaps. If they did, a paving-stone might drop on their heads some night when they were not looking for it."

"According to you I have a pleasant prospect ahead."

"You certainly have."

"You're not jollying me, are you?" asked Joe, suspiciously.

"Not a bit of it. Ask Adams, the day watchman, and he'll confirm all I've told you. I'm rather surprised that Walker put a young chap like you, and a stranger in Buffalo, too, on the job."

"Maybe he doesn't know how tough it is."

"He ought to know, and I guess he does. Perhaps he thinks you'll pull through all right because you're a boy."

"I suppose I'll carry a gun to defend myself and keep intruders from the dock?"

"Oh, yes; but you'll need an arsenal to hold your own if the Night Owls ever get after you."

"The Night Owls, eh?"

"Yes. That's a gang that they say has a rendezvous somewhere in the neighborhood of Dock A."

"It's a wonder that the police wouldn't make a systematic raid on them and clean them out."

"The police have tried it several times, but failed to get any of them. They have a hiding-place that has baffled all of the detectives. Every once in a while some detective, spurred on by a reward, goes down there to try to get a line on their retreat."

"And he fails?"

"His body is usually found floating in the river next day, or the day after."

"Well, I'll try and give a good account of myself while I hold the job."

"I hope you will. At any rate, you have my sympathy."

In due time they reached Dock A.

Joe took particular note of its surroundings.

Every third or fourth house along the river front in that locality appeared to shelter a saloon on the ground floor.

The buildings were largely of the cheap tenement class, and were occupied by longshoremen and their families, and others.

The others comprised many shady characters, known to the police, who slept and fraternized here during the days and early evenings, and put in the small hours of the night elsewhere.

It was a matter of no surprise to their acquaintances when these chaps failed to return from their trips abroad.

In such an event they would generally be found up on examination before some magistrate on the charge of highway robbery, or housebreaking, or something of that nature, and their old haunts missed them sometimes for years while they were living at the expense of the State.

The gang known as the Night Owls confined their operations to the water front.

They were a particularly desperate class of "undesirable citizens."

On election days they were to be seen around the polls in that district, and could always be relied upon by the leader of one of the political parties to bulldoze honest voters, and cast all the ballots necessary to insure victory for the side that took care of them financially, and when they got in trouble, and were haled before a magistrate on some charge or other.

It took the most positive kind of evidence to send one of them to prison, and their reputation was such that it was hard to get an eye-witness of a crime committed by one of them to go into court and testify.

Under such circumstances it was no wonder that the gang flourished, and laughed at the police.

All these facts Joe learned from Adams, the day watchman, before he went on duty that night, after eating his supper in a cheap restaurant in that neighborhood.

So when he went on duty at six o'clock, with a revolver in his hip-pocket, he did so with all the resolution of a young hero who was resolved to do or die.

CHAPTER XII.

A STARTLING SURPRISE.

When darkness fell upon the face of nature, and the sounds of traffic were hushed, Joe began to understand that the country was not the only lonesome spot on earth at night.

There were lonesome spots even in the midst, as it were, of a big city.

The dark waters of the Buffalo River flowed around and past Dock A, as it did about other docks in that vicinity.

A fence surrounded the dock, leaving a narrow footway on either side, and was too high to be scaled by one man, but the top could be reached by a second person standing on another's shoulders.

Joe's duty was to walk around the yard, and occasionally take a peep outside.

The walk up and down the gloomy and tenantless yard was not particularly exhilarating at night, because there was nothing to see but vague-looking objects and shadowy heaps of coal.

The peeps outside the fence were less drowsy, because they gave Joe a view of lighted houses and saloons across the wide water front, and life flowing past them.

At six o'clock he was relieved by Adams, who asked him how he had passed the night.

"All right, sir," replied Joe. "There wasn't a thing doing."

"Things might run that way for a week, or two weeks, or even longer. Then you might find somebody trying to get over the fence to help themselves to a pail of coal, or something else. The quickest way to get rid of them is to hail them once and order them away. If they don't go instantly, hasten their movements with a bullet about their ears."

Joe got his breakfast at a near-by restaurant, and then hastened to his lodgings to have a good sleep.

He got up about three, had his dinner, and after walking around a while took a car which carried him within a couple of blocks of Dock A, where he reported at six.

It was close on to one o'clock in the morning when Joe heard men's voices on the outside of the fence.

The boy suspected that they were there for no good purpose, and he placed his ear to a convenient knot-hole to see if he could hear what they were talking about.

"Now that we've got hold of the girl, Horton, how much are you goin' to work her old man for?" said a voice that strongly resembled that of the stout crook, Coates.

"A good stiff figure, you may depend on, Coates. Both the mighty dollar as well as revenge for the close call we had of bein' sent to Auburn, are powerful arguments in the case. He'll be willin' to come up with a good many yellow-backed bills of large denomination when he realizes that he can't get his daughter back any other way," said Horton, striking a match and lighting a cigar.

Joe was nearly paralyzed with surprise on hearing the men address each other as Horton and Coates, which indicated that they were two of the three convicted burglars who had escaped from the train at the time of the accident near Salamanca.

The flash of the match attracted Joe's notice, and he put his eye to the knot-hole in order to see if he could catch a glimpse of either of the men's faces.

He hardly needed a sight of the men to convince him of the truth of his suspicions, but still it was just as well to make sure.

As he looked through the hole the light of the match showed him the familiar bearded countenance of Ike Horton within a few inches of his eye.

He could only catch an indistinct outline of Coates' face, but he was sure it was that rascal, beyond doubt.

The match also revealed the features and form of Simpson, the thin crook, who had not as yet spoken, and who stood midway between the two.

"It was a neat job to kidnap her on the day after her arrival in this town," spoke up Simpson. "There is the dickens to pay at the Walker house, I'll bet you, at her mysterious disappearance. Every cop in the city has her description by this time, and is on the lookout for her; but they'll never find her—not by a jugful."

"Find her!" ejaculated Horton. "I should say not. The roost of the Night Owls is a sealed book to the Buffalo police, and is likely to remain so. She is safe there for an indefinite stay, in Mother Jinks' care. When Fuller stumps up $5,000 apiece for us, then we'll let her go; otherwise, she stays till he does."

Joe gave a gasp at those words.

Until that moment the identity of the girl those rascals were speaking about had no special interest for him.

Now it was different.

He saw that it was Banker Fuller's daughter Grace they had got into their hands, by some means not so far explained, and that discovery aroused him to a high pitch of excitement and indignation.

The men continued to talk about their plans for compelling Banker Fuller to ransom his daughter for the sum of $15,000, and they figured out how it could be managed safely and expeditiously.

Finally Horton said:

"I'm goin' on to the roost now, to see how the girl is gettin' along. Mother Jinks may lay hands on her if she gives her trouble, and I don't want her hurt, for that might queer the whole business. Are you chaps comin'?"

Simpson and Coates said they were going to a certain saloon, and would be at the roost later.

"Well, you want to keep your weather optics liftin', because the cops all over the State are lookin' for us," warned Horton. "If you are nailed you'll go straight to Auburn, and that'll let you out of your share of the $15,000. Then I'll have to get somebody else to help me put the game through."

Coates and Simpson started to cross the wide thoroughfare, while Horton walked off up the river.

On the spur of the moment Joe decided to desert his post and follow Horton in order to try and locate the rendezvous of the Night Owls.

So he quickly unlocked the small door in the fence, stepped outside, relocked it, and started to trail the indistinct figure of Horton to his destination.

CHAPTER XIII.

IN A BAD FIX.

It was not an easy matter for Joe to keep Horton in sight and at the same time keep that rascal in ignorance of the fact that he was being shadowed.

Horton led his tracker away from the lights and life of the district near Dock A and out along the river front, where houses were few and hardly any human being was stirring.

The prospect grew more and more desolate as they proceeded, and finally Joe saw the shadowy form of a building gradually shape itself out of the gloom ahead.

It stood right at the river side.

In fact, it was partially on the river itself, the rear of the house, which was two stories and a half in height, and as disreputable a looking edifice as it has ever been the lot of an architect to conceive, or a builder to erect, being supported by rows of piles, among which the dark water of the river flowed and eddied.

Horton walked up to the knobless door of this building, laid his hand on a certain part of the jamb, and pressed a spring.

The door opened inward, and the rascal disappeared from the view of the boy, who was some little distance behind him.

Joe hastened forward till he came to the door, and then he saw that there was no handle to it.

He pressed upon it, and found it as tight as wax.

"So this is the rendezvous of the Night Owls," he breathed. "It's a wonder the police have not spotted the place long ago and raided it. Well, there's not much chance of me getting inside of this building, even if I dared take the risk of entering, which I guess would be a foolish proceeding on my part. I'll take a good look at the house and its surroundings, and then I'll hasten away to find a police station. If the Buffalo officers know their business they ought to be able to put the Night Owls out of business between this and daylight."

As Joe was about to withdraw from the door it was suddenly and noiselessly opened, an arm was thrust out, he was seized by the collar with a grip of steel and pulled into an entry-way that was dark as pitch.

The door was shut as noiselessly as it had opened, and then a rough voice hissed in Joe's ear: "Who are you, and what were you followin' me for? I s'pose you didn't think I was on to you, eh? You've got some object, so spit it out, d'ye understand?"

The plucky boy felt that he was in a tight fix.

His sudden capture was such a surprise to him that he was somewhat dazed, and could not open his mouth to save his life if he had wished to.

"So you won't speak. I reckon the detectives sent you out to try and do the work they failed at. Thought, maybe, because you was a boy that you might find out somethin'. Well, you'll find out somethin', I'll warrant. You'll find out what several of the detectives have already discovered—that this place is the short road to the next world. You've put your foot in it, young feller, this time. You'll never see daylight again. Dead men tell no tales, is our motto, and we always keep it before us."

Horton dragged the boy back along the entry till he came to a door, which he pushed open.

Then he shoved Joe into a perfectly bare room.

From a hook on the wall Horton took a strong cord that hung there, in readiness for just such an emergency, and bound the boy's hands behind his back, in spite of the vigorous resistance he put up.

Then he tied Joe's ankles together.

As soon as the brave lad was quite helpless Horton took from his pocket a small folding dark-lantern.

Turning his back on the prisoner, the rascal opened out the lantern, struck a match, and lighted the wick of the little lamp inside.

Then he turned around and flashed the tiny bull's-eye light in Joe's face.

As the flash lighted up the boy's features Horton uttered a surprised imprecation.

He recognized the prisoner as William Benton's son, and the boy who had been largely instrumental in foiling the burglarious attempt of himself and associates on Banker Fuller's house that eventful night, and whose evidence had secured their conviction, on which they had all been sentenced to a ten-year spell in Auburn.

"So it's you, is it?" roared the scoundrel, with another imprecation and a menacing flash of the eyes. "You who did us up in Corinth—you, the son of the man I hate more than any other person on this earth! Not satisfied with what you did to us, you have, in some way, got on our track again after we escaped from the train at the time of the smash-up, and you are tryin' to get us caught again. Do you want to know what your fate is? Listen! Do you hear the swish of the water under this floor? You will be tied to one of the spiles, with your head just below high-water mark. When the tide rises you will feel the hand of death grippin' at your heart. Inch by inch you will feel the cold, clammy water risin' up to your mouth. When it reaches your lips you will struggle in vain to evade its suffocatin' grasp. You will be slowly strangled to death. Your death agony will be prolonged by your frantic efforts to escape your fate. What do you think of it? Does the prospect please you? You might have escaped all this by mindin' your own business. Now you will pay the price of your folly, and to-morrow some one will find your body floatin' in the river, while the newspapers will print the story of another river mystery."

The rascal saw with satisfaction the effect produced on his prisoner by his words, and he gloated over it.

Although he hated the very name of Benton, he had never intended to go out of his way to injure Joe, as his revenge had been satisfied with the wreck of William Benton, and the consequent misery it had brought to the woman who had discarded him for the more successful suitor.

The boy, however, had butted in on him of his own free will; had done him and his pals a serious injury, and so Horton determined he should suffer well for his temerity.

The end of a red bandana handkerchief protruding from the boy's jacket pocket caught Horton's eye.

He whisked it out and bound it around Joe's mouth, gagging him effectually.

Then he went to one of the sashless windows overlooking the river and flashed the bull's-eye down one of the spiles.

The tide was low, but still on the ebb.

He noticed the fact with some disappointment.

It would be some hours before the tide was up to high-water mark.

In fact, a couple of hours after sunrise.

It would not do to carry out his fiendish plan in the light of day, for there were many eyes along the river front at that hour.

He had the alternative of tying the boy down on the mud and letting the water slowly cover his face that way, which would answer the same purpose, so far as snuffing him out was concerned.

This could be carried out before sunrise.

Horton, however, didn't fancy it as much as the other way. It was too quick in reaching results.

He wanted the boy to feel the approach of death for as long a time as possible.

That could only be effected by tying him upright to a spile as soon as the tide began to rise, and then there would be at least four hours of torture before his victim.

So he decided to postpone Joe's death until after dark on the following night.

In the meantime he would remove him to the roost, where he felt that his prisoner would be perfectly safe until he was ready to lead him to execution.

"It's a good thing for you, young fellow, that the tide is on the ebb, instead of on the flow," he said, returning to the boy's side. "It will give you twenty hours or so of life that otherwise you'd miss. The pleasure I shall take in witnessin' your takin' off will, therefore, be deferred till after dark to-night, for it wants only two hours of sunrise now. Don't fool yourself with the idea that this will give you a chance to escape. I'm going to take you to a place where you'll be safe, I warrant you, until I'm ready to dispatch you on your long journey."

Thus speaking, Horton raised the helpless boy in his arms, carried him out of the room, down a slimy pair of wooden stairs to the watery tract under the building, and then around a closely knit line of spiles sunk into the mud.

Pausing before what seemed to be a mass of solid rock on which the building partly rested, Horton pressed a concealed spring.

A portion of the rock swung inward, disclosing a subterranean passage.

Horton stepped inside, dragged in his burden, and closed the entrance.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE ROOST OF THE "NIGHT OWLS."

Horton didn't seem to consider a light necessary in that dark passage.

He knew every foot of the way as well as if the place was lighted by electricity.

Dragging Joe along, he advanced about a dozen feet, until their progress was barred by what seemed to be a dead wall.

Horton felt along the stone until his fingers rested on a small knob.

Pushing this several times, he waited.

In a few minutes a concealed door opened in the wall, and the figure of a repulsive-looking woman appeared in the opening, with a flaring oil lamp in her hand.

She flashed the light in Horton's face and then, without a word, made way for him to pass with his burden.

He entered a roughly finished underground room, and deposited his prisoner on the ground.

The woman, after closing the door and putting two heavy bars across it, came forward and placed the lamp upon a plain deal table in the center of the room.

Joe's eyes roved around the apartment.

Besides the table, he saw that it was furnished with perhaps a dozen stools, a stove, whose chimney disappeared through the roof, a rude kind of dresser filled with crockery-ware, some shelving occupied by odds and ends, and a stout iron-bound chest.

There was a door leading into a room or passage beyond.

The woman seemed to have been the only occupant of the place until their arrival.

She had evidently been entertaining herself with a black bottle and a glass, both of which stood on the table.

"Have you caught another spy, Ike?" asked the woman, glancing at Joe with a wicked eye. "It's a boy!" she added, in some surprise.

"An emissary of the cops who shadowed me to the house. I caught him, and here he is," replied Horton, carelessly.

"Does he go the road?" asked the woman.

"What else, since I've introduced him to the roost? That, if nothing else, would seal his fate, since he who is not one of us that passes yon door leaves hope behind."

"Aye, so he does," replied the woman, with an ugly laugh.

"The girl is the only exception, if her friends come to snuff."

"She was brought here drugged, and drugged she will go away, if at all. Having no knowledge of where she is, or how she got here, she cannot possibly betray our hiding place."

At that moment a bell jingled in the room several times in a peculiar way.

"There's some of the Owls," remarked Horton.

Mother Jinks took up the lamp and went to the door, which she unbarred and opened.

Two hard-looking men of perhaps twenty-five years entered.

Each carried a bag filled with something, which he laid upon the table.

Then they glanced inquiringly at the bound and gagged form of Joe.

"Another detective?" asked one of them, with an ugly look.

"Not quite, but on the same lay," replied Horton. "He shadowed me to the house here, and I collared him. He's a chap who spoiled a good plant for me, Coates and Simpson, a while ago, and got us juggled. We escaped a ten-year term by the skin of our teeth, and now me and my pals are goin' to square the account with him. He goes the road—you know what that means."

"Jimmy and me have had great luck," said one of them. "We've boned a bunch of swag that's worth a small fortune."

The bags were emptied on the table, and their contents proved to be a valuable collection of diamond jewelry worth many thousands of dollars.

After the plunder had been sized up, and favorably commented on by Horton, it was restored to the bags, and the bags handed over to Mother Jinks, to put away in the strong chest, of which she kept the key, and was responsible for the property to the gang.

Joe Benton, in spite of the seriousness of his position, noted all that went on under his eyes with not a little curiosity.

He wondered in what part of this underground roost Grace Fuller was held a prisoner, pending the application to her father for her ransom.

Other members of the Night Owls dropped in, and finally Coates and Simpson appeared.

To the latter pair Horton explained who Joe was, and how he had caught him.

The two rascals were delighted that the boy, to whom they owed such a strong grudge, had fallen into their hands, and they expressed the pleasure they would feel to be present that night, when he was given his quietus among the spiles outside, at high water.

It was now about sunrise, and all hands, except Mother Jinks, who retired to the region beyond the door, turned in on mattresses that were taken from a corner where they had been piled up.

In a short time the boy was the only one in the room who was not snoring away to beat the band.

"I'm afraid it's all up with me this trip," he breathed. "That rascal, Horton, seems to have me dead to rights, and I can expect as little mercy from him as I might from a famished tiger that had me in his grasp. Poor Grace, too, must feel terribly unhappy over her unfortunate plight. I wish I could help her outwit her abductors, even if I couldn't escape my own hard lot; but that's out of the question as matters stand. We're both up against it hard, especially me, and at the present moment I don't see the ghost of a chance to give my enemies the slip."

The hours passed away slower than thick molasses, and at length, overcome by the closeness and heat of the room, as well as by fatigue, the boy gradually sank into a troubled slumber that lasted well into the afternoon.

CHAPTER XV.

ON THE THRESHOLD OF FREEDOM.

When he opened his eyes once more on the room, and gathered his bewildered senses together, he found that all the Owls, including Horton, had left the roost.

The sole occupant of the room was Mother Jinks, and she lay bent, with her arms sprawled on the table, snoring loudly, with the black bottle and a half-filled glass of gin before her.

Joe could only see her hunched-up shoulders on the table.

After gazing a few moments at the female guardian of the roost, Joe became conscious that he was uncommonly hungry.

This sensation became more acute when his eyes rested on the remains of the cold leg of lamb and a portion of a loaf of bread on the table.

Bound hand and foot, he seemed to have a small chance of getting any.

To his surprise, he succeeded in freeing his hands from the cord after a few tugs.

It was then but the work of a moment for him to pull out his knife and cut the cord holding his ankles together.

The next thing he did was to swoop down on the meat and bread.

Then, after washing the food down with a dipper of water, he recalled the desperate position in which he stood, and began to think of his own safety.

And as he thought of himself he also thought of Grace.

He determined to see where she was confined in the roost.

With this purpose in view, he opened the door at the end of the room and found another room behind, where he found a bed and articles of coarse female attire that he knew belonged to Mother Jinks.

Another door caught his eye.

It struck him that the banker's daughter was a prisoner in the room beyond.

As he was considering the matter he saw a small bunch of keys hanging from the lock.

Turning the big one which was inserted in the lock, he opened the door and looked inside the room.

A lighted lamp stood on a box, and revealed one other box in the place and a double mattress in the corner, on which was stretched a girlish form, fully dressed, with her face buried in her arms.

"Grace," he said softly, kneeling down and catching her by the arm.

"Grace," he said again, "don't you know me?"

"Joe Benton!" she gasped.

"Yes, I am Joe Benton, and I am here to rescue you, if I can."

He led the trembling girl out through Mother Jinks' room into the outer apartment, and up to the door of the passage, which he unlocked, for the key was in the lock, and then unbarred.

Taking the lamp from the table to light their way, they walked through the passage till they came to the outer entrance, the one closed by the rock and worked by a spring only.

He flashed the light of the lamp all over the face of the rock without result.

The push-button seemed so well concealed that he couldn't see it.

While Joe was gazing at the rock in great perplexity, and Grace was standing behind him, in a state of anxious suspense, the door suddenly and noiselessly opened before their eyes, and the opening was filled by Horton, with Coates and Simpson right behind him.

For a moment both sides stood spellbound; then Grace uttered a scream and Horton a terrible imprecation.

He rushed forward to seize the boy.

At the same moment Joe recovered his presence of mind, and reaching for the revolver in his hip pocket, he drew the weapon, aimed it at Horton, and fired point-blank.

Horton clapped his hand to his breast and sank on the ground with a groan.

As Coates and Simpson started back aghast at this unexpected denouement, Joe fired at the stout crook, with equally deadly effect.

Coates uttered a cry, and fell against the rocky door, his body keeping it open.

As Joe started to draw a bead on Simpson, that slippery rascal turned and ran.

Joe did not mean that he should escape and bring down other Owls on him and Grace, so he stepped over Coates and fired at the retreating rascal.

The bullet struck his leg, and he went down into the mud and water among the spiles with a splash.

Calling to Grace to follow him, Joe dashed out to capture the agile crook.

CHAPTER XVI.

CONCLUSION.

Simpson struggled to his feet, only to sink down again, for his leg doubled under him, and extracted from him a groan of agony.

Joe seized him without regard to his injury, and dragged him behind the inner row of spiles.

The pain of his wounded leg caused the rascal to faint.

Joe saw that the three rascals had come to the roost by boat instead of through the house.

The boat was tied to a spile a few feet away.

He hastily lifted Grace into the boat, and was about to follow, when he thought about the valuable booty the two Owls had brought in early that morning, and which he had seen Mother Jinks take charge of and lock in the chest.

Joe decided that it was his duty to try and recover the swag, in the interest of the persons from whom it had been stolen, lest some returning Owl should take alarm at the condition of things before he could bring the police there, and remove the plunder to some other place.

Joe ran back into the passage and made his way to the room where the old woman was still snoring at the table.

He rushed back into the room beyond, seized the bunch of keys, returned, and tried one that looked as if it fitted the lock of the chest.

It fitted all right, and he pushed up the cover.

He took out all the bags and carried them outside and placed them in the boat.

There being nothing further to detain him, he got aboard the boat, pushed out from under the spiles, and rowed down the river toward Dock A.

On the way Grace told him that she had come to Buffalo on a visit to her friend, Sadie Walker, daughter of the senior member of the shipping firm with whom Joe had secured employment.

She had reached the city in the morning, and in the afternoon had gone out walking with Sadie in one of the parks not far from her friend's home.

They wandered to a secluded part of the park, and suddenly found themselves in the presence of three men, whom Grace recognized as Horton, Coates and Simpson.

The recognition was mutual, and the men seized them both. Handkerchiefs were pressed over their faces, and both girls fainted.

When Grace came to her senses she found herself in the room from which Joe had rescued her.

Joe then told the girl his story, and by the time he had finished the boat was close to Dock A.

As he hauled the boat up to a narrow flight of water-stairs alongside the dock he was seen and recognized by Adams, the day man.

"Why, where have you been?" asked Adams, in surprise.

"I can't tell you now," said Joe, assisting Grace on to the dock. "I've got to telephone Mr. Walker about this young lady, who is visiting at his house. I've also got to telephone the police, for I've discovered the roost of the Night Owls!"

Joe telephone to the nearest police station first, and what he said over the wire brought a posse of officers in a hurry to Dock A.

Before they arrived Joe had communicated with Mr. Walker, and told him that Grace Fuller was safe, and to send a carriage to the dock for her.

When the officers arrived, in a wagon, Joe was ready to go with them to the old building.

The tide was low when they got there, and so Joe had no trouble in taking them down among the spiles and showing them the entrance to the passage, which was just as he and Grace had left it.

Horton and his pals were still lying in the passage, and were handcuffed and put aboard the wagon with Mother Jinks.

The value of the plunder Joe had brought to Dock A was found to be over $150,000, and Joe subsequently received the several rewards offered for its recovery, amounting in all to $20,000.

Horton and Coates recovered from their wounds, and, with Simpson, were sent to Auburn in due time to work out their ten-year sentences.

Joe, as a matter of course, received the grateful thanks of Banker Fuller and his wife for having rescued Grace from her terrible situation, and as the boy had saved him from being held up for a $15,000 ransom, the banker insisted on presenting Joe with a nest-egg for his future of $5,000.

Mr. Walker got a new night watchman for Dock A, as he didn't think it safe for Joe to continue the job after his exploit against the Night Owls, for there was no saying what the uncaptured members of the gang and their friends might do to the boy if they had an easy chance to seek vengeance on him.

Soon after this exploit, Joe learned that his father, after being tried and acquitted on the charge of incendiarism, had been taken ill and sent to a hospital, where he died, a wreck of his former self.

The shipper gave Joe a good berth in his office, and the lad, in time, worked his way up to a responsible position in the house.

Long before that time he became engaged to Grace Fuller, with her parents' consent, and when he married her the poor boy's fight for fortune had been won.

Next week's issue will contain "A TIP WORTH A MILLION; OR, HOW A BOY WORKED IT IN WALL STREET."

SEND POSTAL FOR OUR FREE CATALOGUE

CURRENT NEWS

German correspondents of the western front of France report that the British are using a new type of gun and shell, according to an Associated Press correspondent. The gun appears to be pneumatic, as it makes no noise when fired, and can, therefore, be used from points very close to the front. The shell which it carries bursts, it is said, with an explosion resembling that of a mine, and the destructive area of the burst is large. It is chiefly used against deep dugouts and trench positions.

The owners of Crab Island, comprising about fifty acres on the New Jersey coast near Little Egg Harbor, have offered this island to the Navy Department for use as a naval base. In the letter to Mr. Daniels, McKeever Brothers, Inc., the present holders of the property, pointed out that it is the only harbor on the coast "between Sandy Hook and the Delaware Breakwater" that is available for this purpose. The Tuckerton wireless station is available, two miles away. "You may have immediate possession," the offer concluded.

A new record for the number of ships passing through the Panama Canal in a month was established in January; the total of oceangoing ships, not including local launches and vessels, was 176. Their aggregate net tonnage was 557,839 tons. The month of greatest traffic previous to this was July, 1915, with 170 ships, having an aggregate net tonnage of 547,370 tons. The traffic in January consisted of seventy-eight ships, of 258,317 net tons, moving from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and ninety-eight ships, 299,514 net tons, from Pacific to Atlantic.

A life buoy capable of sheltering forty persons has been on exhibition in the Willamette River at Portland, Ore. It is intended as a substitute for a lifeboat, and its inventor claims that it is unsinkable, non-collapsible, and will ride upright in the roughest sea, says Popular Mechanics. The device is made entirely of steel and resembles a huge top. Entrance is gained through a trap-door which is water-tight when closed. The buoy is intended to be kept on a vessel's deck, and if in time of danger there is no opportunity to launch it, passengers need only get inside and wait for it to take the water as the boat sinks.

Recruiting for the navy shows a net gain of 2,086 men for the twenty-eight days of February, the greatest net gain which has been made in any month since the Spanish-American War. There has been a gratifying increase in recruiting throughout the country, particularly in the Southern States, where the interest in the navy is unusually great.

The number of navy recruiting stations has been increased to 217, forty-seven main stations and 170 sub-stations. There are now 22,622 actual vacancies in the allowed complement of the navy, as against 26,178 vacancies on Jan. 3. There were 59,039 enlisted men in the navy on Feb. 28.

The Department of Agriculture has issued a warning about the "black Siberian hare," which certain dealers are trying to palm off on the guileless public. The situation recalls that of the "miracle wheats," concerning which the department recently enlightened the country. The "black Siberian hare" is advertised to produce a pelt of high market value. The fact is that, although more skins of hares or rabbits are collected and sold than of all other fur-bearing animals combined, no variety is worth raising for its fur alone. Moreover, Siberia does not produce hares, and the alleged new variety is merely a black strain of the "Flemish giant" breed of European hare.

Germany failed by slightly more than a 50 per cent. margin to make good her threat to sink 1,000,000 tons of merchant shipping during the first month of unrestricted submarine warfare, according to a London dispatch. Her submarines, the figures show, only succeeded in sending to the bottom during the month of February, in round numbers 490,000 tons. This figure only exceeds by 140,000 tons, it is declared, what the British authorities expected would be sunk during that month if ordinary submarine warfare had been continued. It compares with 346,656 tons sunk during December, and 322,067 tons during January.

The last annual report of the Coast Guard recommends the use of aeroplanes in connection with the life-saving work of the service. When a shipwreck occurs too far from the shore to be reached with the line-throwing gun, and when the state of the sea makes it impossible to use lifeboats, it is believed that a line could be carried to the wreck by means of an aeroplane. Apart from their use in life-saving, aeroplanes would be extremely serviceable in the work of locating derelicts. Congress has been asked to provide aviation stations and equipment for the coast guard, and in the expectation that such work will be taken up sooner or later the guard has already assigned three junior officers to undergo training at naval and private aviation schools. An additional argument in favor of this plan is the fact that the aviation facilities provided for the Coast Guard would be a valuable supplement to naval aviation equipment in case of war.

GOOD AS WHEAT

OR

THE BOY WHO WAS ALL RIGHT

By GASTON GARNE

(A SERIAL STORY.)

CHAPTER XIX (Continued).

But nowhere was there any human being other than the four in the mouth of the cavern. At least, nobody was in sight.

When the four had satisfied themselves that this was so, they stepped out into the amphitheater.

A swift glance around, and they were assured that there were no persons other than themselves in this strange place.

Suddenly a wild yell escaped the lips of Boggett.

"Look!" he exclaimed, pointing to a jagged projection six inches long and a couple of inches in diameter, "thet's gol"—solid gol', ez I'm er sinner!"

He picked up a hammer and leaped forward and struck the projection a lusty blow, breaking it off.

The dull yellow of virgin gold glowed where the break occurred, and cries of excitement escaped the lips of the four.

Billock walked along the wall, looking at it closely, and presently he exclaimed:

"Ther ole man whut tole ye erbout this place didn't tell no lie, Bob. Thar is gol' enuff in this here mine ter sink er ship."

"Now ye're shoutin', Hank!" cried Boggett. "Whoop! We're milyunaires, ev'ry one uv us, an' thet's ther trooth!"

Bob was looking all around, for he feared that there might be a hiding-place somewhere about, and that the men who had evidently been at work in the mine recently might suddenly leap up and shoot them down before they could lift a hand to protect themselves.

"Don' ve worry, son," said Billock, who noted the boy's action; "ther varmints got skeered las' night, an' they hev skipped out. I'll bet they don' bother us none."

"I hope that is the case," said Bob; "but I'm afraid they may appear and give us some trouble."

"We'll be more'n enuff fur 'em ef they do come an' try ter bother us."

The four then made their way into every nook and cranny of the mine, and they saw enough gold sticking out of the walls to load their horses down.

"If we can only get it and get away in safety with it," said Bob.

"We'll do it, son, shore ez aiggs air aiggs!" declared Billock, confidently.

"Ye bet we wull!" from Boggett; "now thet we've foun' ther mine, an' know thet ther gol' really is here, thar hain't nobuddy goin' ter keep us frum kerryin' off all we want uv et!"

"How are we going to do it?" asked Bob. "Shall we stay here all the time, or shall we go down to the camp every night?"

"We'll live an' do our eatin' and sleepin' down thar," said Billock; "we'll jest come up here an' work ther mine an'll kerry down ther gol' at noon an' in ther evenin'."

"An' one uv us'll allers be at ther camp in ther daytime ter watch ther gol'," said Boggett.

"I guess that will be the best plan," agreed Bob.

Over at one side of the mine they found where fires had been, there being ashes and partly-burned sticks.

Bob pointed to these and said:

"That is how they made the ghosts. They kindled fires, and then danced about in front of them, and their shadows were visible to us over on the shore."

"I guess ye're right, Bob," agreed Boggett; "ye see, we didn't think erbout ther top uv ther butte bein' hollow like et is."

The four were so eager that they put in the rest of the afternoon securing gold; but Sam was sent down to guard the camp.

When evening came they loaded themselves up with the gold and made their way down to the camp.

They dug a hole at the foot of a huge tree and cached the gold.

Then they cooked and ate their suppers, and Billock and Boggett settled down to smoke.

"This is shore solid comfort, Hank," grunted Boggett, as he stretched himself out at full length on his blanket and puffed away at his pipe.

"I reckon et is, Bill; but et's kinder plebeian-like fur milyunaires ter be smokin' pipes, don't ye think?"

"Waal, we'll smoke twenty-five-cent segars when we git back ter the lan' uv ther livin'."

Then they fell to discussing the persons who had been working the mine and wondering whether or not they would come back.

"We'll be on our guard, anyhow," said Bob.

CHAPTER XX.

THE ROAD-AGENTS APPEAR.

The four gold hunters were up with the sun next morning, and when they had eaten breakfast, Bob, Billock and Boggett set out for the mine, leaving Sam to guard the camp and the gold.

"If you see anybody coming, fire a shot," said Bob.

Sam promised that he would.

The three made their way to the entrance of the cavern and then through the passage and up to the mine. They took a careful look into the mine before showing themselves, as they did not know but the men who had been there before might be there now.

Nobody was there, however, and the three entered and went to work.

They worked away steadily two or three hours, and then Bob climbed a series of rude steps at one side and looked out across the lake.

He had scarcely more than reached the position at the top of the wall before he gave utterance to an exclamation.

"Whut is et, son?" asked Billock.

"That gang of road agents is coming!"

"Whut!"

"Whar air they?"

The two began climbing rapidly and were quickly beside Bob.

They saw that Bob had spoken truly; at any rate, a party of five men, on horseback, were coming across from the shore to the island. The horses were swimming strongly, and were half-way across.

"We mus' stop 'em!" cried Billock.

"How can we do it?" asked Bob.

"Le's git our Winchesters an' send er few threatenin' shots down ter warn 'em," said Boggett; "an' then ef they keep on comin', we'll giv et ter 'em in airnest."

"That's a good idea; we may be able to turn them back," said Bob.

They hastened down and got their Winchesters and climbed back up to the top of the wall.

"I'll fire a shot to attract their attention," said Bob; "and then I'll warn them to go back."

He lifted his Winchester to his shoulder, aimed at a point a dozen yards ahead of the five horsemen and fired.

Crack!

The shot rang out loudly, and the horsemen quickly looked up and saw the three men at the top of the butte.

"Turn back!" cried Bob; "go back, or we will open fire on you!"

There was no time or opportunity for arguing; the horses could not stop, but must keep on swimming or sink, and so the road agents—for that was who the horsemen were—decided that prudence was the better part of wisdom, and promptly turned their horses' heads and started back toward the mainland.

"We'll fix you yet, blast you!" called out the leader of the road agents. "Just you wait!"

"Shet yer head er we'll plug ye fur keeps!" yelled Boggett. "Ye tork too much, ye miser'ble galoot!"

There was no reply, and it was evident that the road agents feared the men on the top of the butte might put their threat into execution.

"We've got 'em scart, pards," said Billock.

"Yaas, but they won' giv' et up so easy ez all thet," declared Boggett.

"That's my idea, too," said Bob. "They will wait till dark and then come across, likely."

"We'll lay fur 'em an' plug 'em ef they try et," said Billock.

"Thet's whut we'll hev ter do," agreed Boggett.

Feeling confident that the road agents would make no further effort to cross during the day, the three descended and went to work again.

"Them scoun'rels hez interfered an' caused me ter be er thousan' dollars poorer than I would hev been," growled Boggett. "I c'u'd hev easy knocked orf thet much gol' while we wuz chinnin' 'em."

Bob laughed.

"Oh, well, we will have plenty of time in which to secure all the gold we can carry off, I guess," he said.

"I dunno 'bout thet," was the reply, with a shake of the head; "an' my 'rithmetic allers tol' me ter make hay while ther sun wuz shinin', er words ter that effeck."

Bob laughed and said:

"That's a rule, but I guess the sun will shine long enough for us to secure all the gold we want."

"All we want?" snorted Billock; "waal, I guess not, son. W'y, did ye ever see ther man thet hed all ther gol' he wanted? I guess not! An' I guess ye never wull."

"Perhaps you are right, Hank; but we will be able to secure all the gold that we will need, anyway."

"I dunno 'bout thet, Bob," said Boggett; "I tell ye, Havanner seegars an' champagne wine is some expensive, an' ye bet them's ther kin' uv luxshoories thet I'm goin' ter swim aroun' in arter we git back ter siverlizashun!"

"Ye bet!" from Billock; "an' I may take er no-shun ter git married—an' thet's expensive bizness, too, ye bet."

"Yaas—an' dangerous, too," grinned Boggett; "better cut thet out, pard."

They worked and talked, and occasionally Bob ascended the rude steps and took a look around to see if he could see anything of the road agents.

They did not show themselves, however, and at noon the three carried their gold down to the camp and cached it with the rest.

"What was that shot about?" asked Sam. The butte had been between him and the road agents, and he had not seen them.

(To be continued.)

FACTS WORTH READING

PAPER BLOWN SIXTY MILES.

Relatives of J. A. Swartz of Rex, Ga., killed in the cyclone several weeks ago, recently received from Des Arc, Ala., a quantity of letters and papers which were blown away when the Swartz home was destroyed. They had been carried more than sixty miles by the wind.

JAPAN SENDS MEXICO MUNITION MACHINERY.

The cartridge-making machinery purchased from Japan has been unloaded at Manzanillo from the steamer Katchiro Maru and will soon be put in operation. Two hundred Japanese experts accompanied the shipments to set up the machinery and operate it. It is hoped by the Government that this machinery will make Mexico independent of other countries for ammunition.

NEARLY 1,000 IN FAMILY.

The biggest family in this county has almost 1,000 members. It is at Reserve, nine miles north of Hia-watha, Kan. Reserve is a small town of 200 or more people with an average Kansas population in the country surrounding for an area of six miles. Yet in the town and the entire area of country within six miles of the town there are not more than ten families who are not related to each other by ties of blood or marriage. Of these ten families nearly all are strangers who have moved into the community in recent years.

LARGEST MOTOR YET BUILT.

What is said to be the largest electric motor yet built has recently been completed by a leading American electrical manufacturer, for use in driving a two-high 35-inch reversing blooming mill, which reverses for every pass; that is, every time metal goes through the rolls. Reversals can be made from low speed to full speed in about two seconds, and in regular work nineteen or twenty passes are made in two minutes. The motor has a rating of 15,000, and complete it weighs more than 250 tons. It is 20 feet high, and the shaft is over 2 feet in diameter.

FIND OPIUM IN DRIED DUCKS.

Quong Sun Chong, dealer in rare china, costly silks, and ornaments of unique design, at 30 Mott Street, New York, recently made the peculiar addition to his stock of an importation of dried ducks, that looked like antiques, but possessed a charm for Oriental palates. The ducks sold at tremendous prices, ranging from $10 to $100 each. Nobody could buy one of the long-dead fowls, however, without a proper introduction and a secret password.

Internal Revenue Agents Yancey and Dobbs procured one of them by stratagem and found a quantity of opium inside of it, carefully wrapped in small waterproof bags. They arrested Lum Suey, Quong Sun Chong's clerk, and United States Commissioner Hitchcock held him in $2,000 bail for examination.

BRANDED AS A FALSEHOOD.

"Berlin newspapers," say the Overseas News Agency (Germany's official press bureau), "say it is reported reliably that the British have tried to induce neutral ships to carry poisoned food and wine, in the hope that the crews of German submarines will take these articles and be poisoned."

The statement in the German press that English ships are carrying poisoned food, and urging neutrals to do the same, so the German submarine crews will be destroyed if they eat it, was characterized as a preposterous falsehood by a high naval authority.

"The idea of such a thing originated in a German head," he said, "for it certainly would not have been conceived by any one else. It was Germans who placed poison in wells in Africa, and they dropped poison from aeroplanes in Roumania. They are probably thinking of using poison in some way again and are in advance accusing us of its use."

LEAD PENCILS.

The lead pencil so generally used to-day is not, as its name would imply, made from lead, but from graphite. It derives its name from the fact that prior to the time when pencils were made from graphite, metallic lead was employed for the purpose. Graphite was first used in pencils after the discovery in 1565 of the famous Cumberland mine in England. This graphite was of remarkable purity and could be used without further treatment by cutting it into thin slabs and encasing them in wood.

For two hundred years England enjoyed alone the profits of the pencil-making industry. In the eighteenth century, however, says the Scientific American, the lead pencil industry had found its way into Germany. To-day a large part of the pencil-making trade is centered in the United States. American manufacturers supply nine-tenths of the pencils needed at home and have entered largely into the competition of the world's markets.

The principal raw materials that enter into the making of a lead pencil are graphite, clay, cedar and rubber. The graphite, as it comes from the mines, is broken into small pieces, the impure particles being separated by hand. It is then finely divided in large pulverizers and placed in tubs of water, so that the lighter particles of graphite float off from the heavier particles of impurities.

BEN AND THE BANKER'S SON

—OR—

THE TROUBLES OF A RICH BOY'S DOUBLE

By ED KING

(A SERIAL STORY)

CHAPTER I.

LOOKING FOR A JOB.

The first time Ben Leslie got himself into trouble on account of his remarkable resemblance to another boy was after he had been looking for work in New York about three weeks.

This was in the spring-time, several years ago, or, to be a little more accurate, it was on a Tuesday, the first of May, and it happened about eleven o'clock in the morning, just after the boy had been turned down at Winkler & Weiss's tobacco firm on Front street, where in answer to an advertisement in the morning paper he had applied for a place.

Ben was in the depths of despair that day, and the hopeless look on his face was enough to condemn him.

He had now been in New York three weeks, having blown in from Fuddebackville, Pennsylvania, a town which might well have been described by a toper as "tooral—rural," for it was about as near nothing as any town in the State.

Ben left Fuddebackville on the day after the squire gave him the hundred dollars, which was all there was left after his dead father's farm was sold under foreclosure.

Ben kicked at the amount, but the squire coolly informed him that he ought to consider himself very lucky to get anything, and he supplemented the statement by his sage piece of advice, which the orphan boy, fresh from the farm, was wise enough to take.

"If you really intend to go to New York to seek your fortune, Ben, you will need new clothes, hat and shoes; but don't buy them here at the store or you'll look like a jay when you get to town. Buy in New York, even if you spend more money; then you will stand some show to get a job."

So Ben went to New York and on the day after his arrival here is what he had spent:

Carfare, $12; clothes, $20; shoes, $3; hat, $2.50; meals, $1; night's lodging, $1—total, $39.50.

Ben had only done the best he could to make himself look like other boys such as he saw when he struck New York.

It made his $100 look sick, though, just the same. "I must get a job at once," he said to himself.

Easier said than done.

Three weeks had now passed, and Ben had done everything that a boy without friends or influence could do to get a job, but had met with no success.

First he tried applying in person, going from one business place to another.

The first day's experience showed him that this was not the way, for he could find no one even willing to listen to him.

Then he tried answering advertisements by letter and in person.

But here he found himself up against another snag—three if he had only known it.

Ben's early education had been somewhat neglected.

Thanks to his father's persistent correction, he could talk grammatically, but his handwriting was poor and his spelling abominable.

Thus he never got a single answer to his letters, and at the time of which we write he could not imagine why.

With his personal applications it always ran about as it did on the morning of which we speak.

We propose to describe this experience, as it will stand for about two dozen similar ones which the boy had passed through during his three weeks' stay in New York.

"Wanted—A boy for general office work. Apply to Winkler & Weiss, No. — Front street."

This was the ad.

Ben had learned that it was wise to get the paper early.

He was on hand at the Front street place a few minutes after seven o'clock, where he found twenty boys on a line.

Ben congratulated himself. He had grown used to this sort of thing, and expected to find at least forty.

Then came a three hours' wait before Mr. Weiss arrived, and until he came no boy was admitted to the store.

Next came that anxious time when Ben expected to hear called out: "Boy engaged! You fellows chase yourselves now"

Usually it came before Ben's turn.

Only in four of five instances had he been able to get an interview.

This morning it went differently, however, and nineteen boys went in and came out, each with some remark to make about the firm of Winkler & Weiss.

"They're no good!" "They won't pay nothing." "Say, they want the earth." "You fellows better sneak." "Nothing doing here."

This was the way the talk ran, and when it came Ben's turn and he was shown into a stuffy little office where a fat man in his shirt sleeves sat smoking a rank cigar, it was no wonder he felt discouraged in advance.

The fat man looked Ben over contemptuously, and the following conversation ensued:

"What's your name?"

"Ben Leslie."

"Where have you worked?"

"I have never work here in New York, sir. I——"

"You're from the country?"

"Yes, sir. I——"

"You have had no experience in any kind of business?"

"No, sir. But——"

"Any one you can refer to here in New York as to your character?"

"Not here, sir. But——"

"Get out! If you have no city references we can't use you."

If Ben had been a dog, the tone employed could not have been more contemptuous.

Why do so many business men think it necessary to speak in this way to boys who are only doing their best to get a start in life?

But it is so, and it is a pity that it is so.

Ben had been up against it before.

This lack of reference was the snag he struck every time.

Heretofore he had given it right up and gone away, but in this instant he made up his mind to make a desperate attempt to get in a word in his own behalf.

"If you would only let me speak, sir!" he cried, boldly. "I'm used to hard work on my father's farm. I can give you references in the town I came from. I don't think I'm altogether a fool. All I want is a chance."

Three times the man Weiss ordered him out of the store while Ben was getting off this speech.

But the boy persisted and finished.

Weiss looked at him narrowly. He seemed to like him better for his boldness.

"Where are you from?" he asked.

"McKean County, Pennsylvania."

Ben was ashamed of the Fuddebackville part.

"Suppose I give you a trial; are you willing to pitch in and work?" Weiss asked then.

"Indeed I am, sir," replied Ben, his hopes rising.

"What wages would you be willing to pay?"

"Three dollars a week to begin with."

"But, Mr. Weiss, I couldn't get board for that."

"That's nothing to me. I can get all the boys I want for three a week."

"But, sir——"

"Oh, get out! Get out! You want the earth!" roared Weiss.

He sprang up, and taking Ben by the shoulders, pushed him into the store, at the same time bawling: "Next!"

Ben slipped out, receiving the jeers of the boys on the waiting line as he hurried down the street.

But they did not call out "Rube" or "jay" or anything of that sort, as they surely would have done if Ben, neglecting Squire Town's advice, had bought his clothes in Fuddebackville.

We have now given a fair sample of Ben Leslie's three weeks' experience at looking for a job in New York.

The boy had been as economical as possible. He had not wasted a cent, and still had some money left, but it was plain to him that this state of things could not go on much longer.

"I shall never get work this way," thought Ben. "What on earth shall I do? If I don't get a job within two or three days I must try my luck with some carpenter or mason or something of that sort."

And if he had come to that, which he did not, Ben would have found himself up against all kinds of snags.

Then it would have been trade union rules to contend with.

Ben's plan was impossible, so far as New York was concerned.

So much for the business end of our hero's situation. Now we come to our story, for that morning Ben was to meet with an adventure which in the end was destined to change his whole career.

Already the boy had fallen into the way which comes to so many who fail to meet with success in New York.

The streets, with their towering buildings and the hurrying crowd, had come to possess a certain fascination for him.

Hour after hour he would wander about aimlessly, after he had exhausted his list of applications for work.

Usually Ben did not give up until after two o'clock. He had already learned that it is useless to apply for work in New York late in the afternoon.

But this morning, although he had several other places on his list, he felt no heart to visit them.

"It's the same everywhere, and always will be the same," he said to himself. "There is no place in this town for a country boy."

That there is a place somewhere in the world for every boy who was ever born, providing he is persistent and willing to work, was a lesson Ben had yet to learn.

(To be continued.)

TIMELY TOPICS

DRUNK, MAKES ORPHANS OF FIVE.

Returning to his home in Harland Hollow, Conn., in an intoxicated condition, Frank Stewart, about forty years old, killed himself with a shotgun the other afternoon.

Mrs. Stewart and his five children him themselves in the pantry when Sthewart threatened their lives. Presently they heard the report of a gun and found Stewart dead in the sitting-room. They fled to neighbors, who notified Selectman Wilbur Miller of the tragedy.

The eldest child is a boy about twelve and the youngest a girl about two. Stewart also leaves several brothers.

WORLD'S DEEPEST WELL.

Gas men throughout Northwestern Pennsylvania are waiting with much interest the final result of drilling operations at the two deep test wells located at Kersey and McDonald, both Pennsylvania towns.

The Geary well, at McDonald, is almost twice as deep as the one at Kersey, having reached a depth of 7,218 feet, which makes it the second deepest in the world. The world's deepest well is in Roumania, and is 7,300 feet deep, but it is likely that the Geary well will make a new world's record.

Its promoters already have spent $300,000 in the venture, and another $100,000 is to be invested before it is abandoned. When the drill reached a depth of 7,110 feet a strain of rock salt over 100 feet thick was discovered.

BIG SUBMARINE STARTS ON 3,500-MILE TRIP TO SPAIN.

With the Spanish national colors and coat of arms painted on the conning tower and carrying two American experts, the Isaac Peral, constructed for Spain, and one of the largest submarines ever built in this country, started shortly before 11 o'clock the other morning on her 3,500-mile trip to Cadiz, Spain. Outside of the harbor she was picked up by the Spanish merchantman Claudio Lopez, which will act as a convoy.

The hull of the boat was built by the Electric Boat Company, at Quincy, Mass. She carries two 600-horsepower Diesel engines of special design, built by the New London Ship and Engine Company, and a disappearing rapid-fire gun, built by a subsidiary of the Bethlehem Steel Company.

LUMINOUS HATS FOR LONDON.

The almost total darkness of London's streets since the first Zeppelins began making their visits has made necessary some sort of light to prevent pedestrians from running into each other. Gas Logic describes a recent invention that is doing its bit toward making the streets safe. This is a luminous hat. The inventor says of it:

"The difficulty, of course, was to find a suitable substance. Phosphorus is too dangerous—it is inflammable; it smells and would probably damage the hat. I discovered a firm who are employing a mixture of sulphides made into a liquid. It does not damage the material, it does not smell, it lasts a long time, is invisible by day and gives off a striking bluish light at night. Moreover, the more it is exposed to daylight or artificial light the more it shines. The firm have used it successfully on the surface of paper, and lumincus paper is now made in large sheets and is, I understand, already being extensively employed."

SCHOOLBOYS FORM "ARMY."

The New York City Schoolboy Army is rapidly becoming a reality. Every week about 500 recruits are added to the high-school military units that have been organized through the efforts of the officers of the Public Schools Athletic League. Acting under the authority of General George W. Wingate and Major General O'Ryan, Dr. C. Ward Crampton, the league's secretary, has been organizing the schoolboy battalions.

The National Guard has assisted by granting the use of armories and, in some cases, by lending rifles and other equipment.

Seventeen out of the twenty high-schools have started enlistment campaigns, and at least 2,500 high-school students are learning military tactics, camping, rifle-shooting, sanitation, first aid, wall scaling, signaling and other military arts.

Stuyvesant High School has received 175 rifles from the United States government, and has the use of the Sixty-Ninth Regiment Armory on two afternoons a week. Captain Davidson of the Seventy-First Regiment has been assigned to instruct the boys. There are 250 active members, and 200 are fully uniformed.

The Boys' High School of Brooklyn has three full companies and another company is being organized. Two companies are uniformed. They use the Thirteenth Regiment Armory, and Sergeant Humphries of the Thirteenth Coast Artillery is drilling them.

Manual Training High School has permission to use the Fourteenth Regiment Armory and has an organization of 150 students. Captain Hetzel of the Fourteenth Regiment is their expert adviser. Erasmus Hall High School has a mounted organization. Fifty boys are training at the First Cavalry Armory. The First Cavalry has promised to lend horses.

Fame and Fortune Weekly

NEW YORK, APRIL 13, 1917.

TERMS TO SUBSCRIBERS

Single Copies06 Cents
One Copy Three Months75 Cents
One Copy Six Months	1.50
One Copy One Year	3.00

POSTAGE FREE

HOW TO SEND MONEY—At our risk send P. O. Money Order. Check or Registered Letter; remittances in any other way are at your risk. We accept Postage Stamps the same as cash. When sending silver wrap the Coin in a separate piece of paper to avoid cutting the envelope. Write your name and address plainly. Address letters to

Harry E. Wolff, Pres. } FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher
 N. Hastings Wolff, Treas. }
 Charles E. Nylander, Sec. } 168 West 23d St., N. Y.

Good Current News Articles

Recruiting during February resulted in 4,852 men being added to the regular army, the War Department announced on March 8. Officers view the results as highly satisfactory and indicating that the army can be brought to its authorized strength before June 30.

To relieve the serious coal famine at Baker, Ore., dealers have ordered the mine at Rock Springs, Wyo., to speed a shipment by parcel post. The order was received and the coal started by mail, but a snowstorm stopped the mail trains. The postage on coal from Rock Springs to Baker is $83 a ton.

Unable to complete sufficient storage tanks to take care of the oil production in the newly developed Bedwell-Bowlus-Ross lease, northwest of Lola, Kan., a force of men and teams were put to work to excavate a pond of 5,000-barrel capacity, which will be used pending the building of tanks or pipe lines. Oil men, after inspection, estimated one well to be pumping near 125 barrels daily.

Charles Barr of Greenfield, Ind., has a silver dollar, both sides of which are the same. The dollar was paid him when he drew $2,000 from an Anderson bank twenty-two years ago to pay off men working on a street contract. The piece was not noticed until one of the workmen presented it at an Anderson store and it was refused. He returned it to Barr, who has carried it since. The eagle is shown on both sides of the dollar, and therefore it has no date. The money is genuine. Mr. Barr never has found any person who has seen a similar dollar.

Eucalypts are evergreens, which shed their bark but not their leaves; but they are not shade trees. The leaves are placed in inclined rather than in horizontal positions and the passage of light is but little obstructed. For this reason, says the National Geographic Magazine, smaller trees and bushes and grass grow underneath, and the woods in places assume the appearance of a jungle from which arise the towering shafts of trees. It is interesting to note that primitive types of eucalyptus, as well as the young of more modern types, have horizontal leaves, pointing to a time in the geologic past when the climate was more congenial and no precautions to conserve moisture need be taken. In view of the present and prospective value of Australia's national tree, it is a little surprising to find that cutting and burning is proceeding with scant scientific supervision. California and South America are planting eucalypts; Australia is cutting them down. Australian hardwoods rival mahogany in beauty and susceptibility of polish, and are unsurpassed among the world's timbers in strength, durability and resistance to fungus and insect attacks.

Grins and Chuckles

"You needn't sit up for me to-night, Maria." "I won't, dear, I'll be standing just inside the door for you."

"Jenkins holds his head mighty high this mornin'. What's happened?" "Just put a mortgage on the mule an' sold a mocking-bird for ten dollars."

Model—Pardon me, sir, but isn't there another artist in this building? Artist—Well, that is a matter of opinion. There is another fellow who paints.

Hicks—If patience was a virtue Loeffler is one of the most virtuous men on earth. Wicks—Got lots of patience, eh? Hicks—Yes; he's been sitting around for about ten years waiting for work.

"John," said the political leader's wife, "you'll have to get a new policeman assigned to this beat; Bridget doesn't like the present one." "All right," said he, "and while I'm about it, I'll get one that likes his meat rare. I'm getting tired of overdone beef."

"Hiram, what profession do you think our John ought to follow?" "I dunno," replied Farmer Kornkob; "John is rather handicapped. The only profession he thinks he is naturally adapted to is that of a capitalist, and I can't see where the money's comin' from."

A little boy told his friend, another youngster, that his mother was accustomed to give him a penny every morning so that he should take his medicine in peace and quietness. "Well, what do you do with it?" inquired the little friend. "Mother puts it in the money-box until there is a shilling." "And what then?" "Why, then mother buys another bottle of medicine with it."

A DETECTIVE OUTWITTED.

By Col. Ralph Fenton.

Some years ago, in the month of December, I was strolling in the neighborhood of Scotland Yard, when I noticed that I was followed by a short, thick-set man of peculiar appearance.

He looked about three or four-and-twenty, and was shabbily dressed in clothes which had never been made for him.

The old cord trousers, much too large, were those of a working-man.

The vest, a bright scarlet, was that of a groom or coachman; whilst the surtout, patched as it was, had the unmistakable cut of a West End tailor.

It struck me that we were old acquaintances, for his was a face, once seen, not easily to be forgotten.

He was very ugly.

The greatest peculiarity about him was the eyes, which were of a dark hazel, with an extraordinary obliqueness of vision that made it impossible to tell whether he was looking you in the face or not.

His head was covered with an old sealskin cap under which was a profusion of hair of a golden red; while his face was ornamented with a luxurious crop of whiskers of the same fiery hue.

All this I noticed as he twice passed—each time looking as if about to address me.

As he was passing the second time, I turned on my heel, and said:

"Well, my man, you appear to know me?"

"Yes, Mr. Sharpe," he replied, "I know you, though I dare say you have forgotten me. My name is Charlie Fox; and you've had me before the beak more than once when I was young."

"Why," I said, "you are the rascal that belonged to the Westminster gang, and who used to give us all so much trouble."

"Yes, guv'nor; but since my mother died I've been trying to keep on the square. I've been to sea, and been working about the docks, or wherever I could get a job. Lately I ain't had anything to do, and I'm almost starving. I've been following you, thinking you might give me something to get me some grub. It's hard work to keep straight after you've once gone wrong, 'specially when you're hungry."

I thought this story might be true.

I remembered him as a young thief, with a bad mother, but that was years ago; and I knew if he had been knocking about London I must have heard something of him.

"Look here, Fox," I said, "you may be telling me a lie; but, if you are hungry I will give you a meal."

I took him into the nearest public house, and gave him some cold meat and bread, and beer; and his appetite certainly confirmed one part of his tale.

When he had finished his dinner he said:

"Now, you've done me a turn which I shan't soon forget, and I'll do you one by putting you up to a good thing. You know about the murder of the woman at Glasgow, and I can tell you where to lay hands on the cove that did it. There's a hundred pounds reward, and I suppose if I plant you on him you'll give me half?"

The murder was one of peculiar atrocity, committed a month before in Glasgow, upon a poor girl.

The police were at fault, and the home secretary had offered one hundred pounds reward for the discovery of the criminal.

At first it struck me as improbable that Fox could know anything about it; but he told me that he was lodging down at East End; and the murderer, a sailor, was lodging in the same house, and had confessed the crime to him.

Still I could not see a motive for Fox betraying his friend, and said:

"You are, no doubt, very clever, Mr. Fox; but you must not try to make me believe because I have given you a meal that you are willing to round on a pal."

"You forget, Mr. Sharpe," he replied, "the half of the reward, which will give me a fresh start; beside that, I owe the man a grudge, and if I live I'll pay him."

I told him he could soon prove whether his information was true by showing me the house where the man lived.

I would take a couple of officers with me, and arrest him at once.

To this, however, Fox would not listen.

He said the man was a most desperate character, and surrounded by friends, and there would be but little chance of taking him there.

His idea was to entice him west, and take him off his guard.

Even then Fox said that there would be considerable risk, as the murderer carried with him the knife with which he had committed the crime, and threatened to use it on any one that attempted to take him.

After further conversation it was arranged that Fox should meet me that night.

My plan was soon matured.

I got an order for one of the theaters for the following night.

Fox was to invite the man to accompany him, but, before entering the theater, was to take him into a public house, and when he was drinking his glass we would take him.

Punctually at the time appointed Fox met me.

I gave him the order for the theater, and explained what I wished him to do, at the same time giving him a few shillings for his expenses.

I waited for the following evening with considerable anxiety.

The case was a most important one, and, if I could carry it to a successful issue, would add considerably to my reputation.

I chose two officers to accompany me, both of them experienced and powerful men.

Seven o'clock was the time named; but, to guard against mistake, we were in the Strand half an hour earlier, the three of us being in plain clothes.

Seven o'clock arrived—eight o'clock—but no appearance of our men; and at half-past eight we gave it up.

I felt assured I had been thoroughly sold.

Next morning, however, I found at the station a scrawl from Fox, saying that the man had got so drunk the night before that he could do nothing with him, and that he would meet me at twelve o'clock, at the house where I had given him his dinner; and if I could give him another order for the theater, he felt sure of bringing the murderer up that night.

I met Fox, gave him the order, and arranged to be on the lookout at seven o'clock.

We had not waited many minutes before I saw Fox coming along the Strand, in company with a tall man in a rough peajacket.

He stopped to look at a shop window, and as I passed I noticed that the tall man had the cut of a sailor.

They walked on, and then turned into the bar of a public house.

In half a minute my colleagues and I followed, and asked for something to drink.

We were the only people in the bar, and the barmaid was just serving Fox and his friend with two glasses of ale.

At the back of where the man stood was a small gas-burner, and my two officers went behind him, as if to light their pipes.

The moment that he lifted his glass to his lips, I sprang upon him, and my assistant at the same moment seized him.

Quick as we were, he managed to wrench his left arm away, and, striking straight out, sent me sprawling on the floor.

My two men, however, held him fast, and by the time I regained my feet, had the handcuffs on him.

When I looked closer at our prisoner I was a little bit staggered.

He had a fine, handsome face, and certainly had not the look of one who would commit a murder.

"Well, mates," he said, "this is rather rough work. What do you want with me?"

"We want you," I replied, "for a murder committed in Scotland."

"Murder! I never hurt anybody in my life."

Calling a cab, two of us accompanied our prisoner, the third officer being left with Fox, with orders to follow us to the station.

I stated the charge to the inspector on duty, and the prisoner was asked his name.

He gave that of Archibald Brown, of Greenock, and said he was a sailor.

On searching him, we found in his possession two sovereigns and some silver, and a large clasp-knife, such as is usually worn by seafaring men.

I took Fox to a coffee-house, and arranged with the proprietor to supply him with board and lodging.

Two men from the force, in plain clothes, were told to watch him night and day, with orders to arrest him if he made any attempt to escape.

The next morning the prisoner was brought before a magistrate.

My witness, Fox, would not, I thought, make a very favorable impression in his ordinary costume; so I purchased, at a second-hand, shop, a suit of clothes for him.

At the police court he gave his evidence in such a straightforward way as to favorably impress the magistrate with its truth.

Finally, Brown was remanded for a few days, to enable us to communicate with the authorities at Glasgow.

We immediately telegraphed to the chief of the police at Glasgow, stating that we had arrested a man named Brown for the murder of the woman, and that the prisoner was remanded until the following Monday.

We received a telegram in reply that an officer would be sent up to London in time for the examination.

Next morning we had a letter confirming the telegram.

The murder had, it appeared, been quite a mystery until the day before the receipt of our message, when a woman asserted that she had seen the deceased on the night of the murder in company with a sailor named Brown, and that she had watched them go into the house together.

In the meantime we kept a sharp watch upon Fox; but the officer reported that he scarcely ever left the house where he was staying.

Our men watched him up to Saturday night, when, so convinced had we all become of his good faith, that the officers were withdrawn.

On Sunday afternoon I looked in to see Fox, to tell him that we should want him at the police court the next morning at eleven.

I found him having his tea, and apparently quite at home in the quarters I had provided.

That night I met the Scotch officer at the Great Northern station, who congratulated me on the successful arrest which I had made.

I admitted that I thought there was some credit due to me, as the prisoner, being such a tall, powerful man, there had been some danger.

His reply took all the breath out of my body. "Eh, mon, there's some mistake here. The mon we want is a wee chap, nicknamed 'Red-headed Charley,' but whose real name is Brown, alias Fox, alias Sinclair, and half a dozen others."

A light broke in upon me. A few words of explanation to the Scotchman, and as fast as a hansom cab could go, we tore down to Fleet street, but the bird had flown.

The actual murderer had left the coffee shop about an hour before, and from that day we have never seen nor heard anything of him.

ARTICLES OF ALL KINDS

BEAR MEAT FOR BEEF.

Many big black bears have been slain this fall in the mountains near Webster, W. Va., and others have been trapped. Jake Mullins and John Leslie have killed and captured eight bears so far this season and they find a ready market for the meat.

HUTS FOR BRITISH SOLDIERS.

A recent invention adding to the comfort of the British and Canadian forces at the French front is described in a dispatch received from London. It is known as the Nissen hut, a semi-circular shelter with the appearance of a big piece of stove pipe, half buried in the earth, and containing doors and windows. There is room for twenty-five men in each hut. The convenience of transportation and the speed with which they can be erected enable men hitherto forced to sleep in the open during an advance to obtain shelter.

The event of the week at the Canadian Army headquarters at the French front, according to the dispatch, was a visit by Sir Robert Borden, Canadian Premier, and Robert Rogers and J. D. Hazen, members of the Premier's Cabinet. The famous First Brigade of the Dominion's original division passed in review.

SAW SON IN MOVIE.

When R. E. Washington, a hotel man of Charleston, W. Va., went into a moving picture theater he learned the whereabouts of his twenty-year-old son Lawrence, who disappeared from his home two years ago.

The film showed a picture of the dreadnought Pennsylvania in target practice in the Hampton Roads proving grounds, with Lawrence Washington manning one of the guns. The father recognized his son instantly.

The picture showed honors being conferred on the young man, who made three hits without a miss, as a result of which he was promoted from an ordinary seaman to chief gun pointer, with an increase of $8 in his monthly stipend.

The youth is a direct descendant of George Washington's brother Charles, for whom Charlestown, W. Va., was named.

GOES THROUGH YALE ON $550 IN 4 YEARS.

It cost the most economical member of the class of 1917 in Yale University just $550 to get through his four years of college life, according to the statistics of the senior class, which were given to a waiting world to-day. The best spender in the class scraped through by the expenditure of $15,000, which sum, he was careful to state, did not include vacations, trips to Europe, automobiles and such trifling incidentals.

Although the class of 1917 had 112 working members, its collective earnings amounted to only $53,352, as against $306,979 earned by the class of 1916, with 120 working members.

Harry Le Gore, the Yale athlete who was disqualified for one season because he spent his vacation playing baseball, was the unanimous choice of the class as its best athlete, which is the first time a senior class has ever agreed upon anything. Le Gore also won the blue ribbon for having done the most for Yale, second prize as the most popular member of the class, and got twenty votes as the member most to be admired. He also got six votes as the hardest worker and fifteen as the most versatile. S. A. Pumpelly, a member of the football team, was the winner in the most to be admired and most popular classes. He also took second prize as the best-natured and third as the most congenial.

AUSTRALIA THE ONLY ONE-RIVER CONTINENT.

There are in Australia no Colorado or Columbias or Tennessees, trenching plateaus and crossing mountain chains, and no counterpart of the thousands of spring-fed brooks and streams issuing from lakes widely scattered over the country. The large area in Utah and Nevada from which dwindling streams never escape to the sea is represented in Australia by an enormous expanse of territory, comprising fully half of the continent.

The heart of the United States is a well-watered land of fields and woods and cities; the corresponding part of Australia is dry and barren and thinly populated, remarks the National Geographic Magazine. The Murray-Darling is the one great river system of Australia. It drains five-fifths of New South Wales, more than one-half of Victoria, and nearly one-seventh of the entire Australian Continent.

Because of its unfavorable outlet, its small volume, its snags and sand bars and great sinuosities, navigation of the Murray is limited to small light-draft steamers, towing one or two barges. Regular traffic in grain and wool is maintained during seven months of the year from the mouth of the river to Wentworth, 500 miles, and small boats reach Abury.

In the flood year of 1870 a steamer went beyond the Queensland border along a river sixty miles wide, and in 1890 steamers on the Darling between Wentworth and Burke "traveled for hours without seeing any land, and in one instance discharged cargo twenty-five miles from the ordinary channel of the river." But a few years later (1902-1903) the Darling ceased to flow for eleven months. During exceptional years the bed of the Murray is partly dry and the waters near its mouth become too salt for stock.

INTERESTING ARTICLES

TO MINT MEXICAN COINS.

Financial agents of the Mexican Government, it was learned, have made inquiry at the Philadelphia Mint regarding prices and facilities for minting Mexican gold coins. Within the last ten days a representative of Stallforth & Co., New York bankers, asked the price per thousand pieces for coining cinco pesos, $5 gold pieces. He was told the mint could manufacture 60,000 pieces a week. The price was not made public.

Authority to do the work must come from the director of the mint at Washington. It was said at the mint that unofficial information had reached there that master dies, made at the Philadelphia Mint for the Mexican Government ten years ago, are on the way here. It was reported that Rafael Nieto of the Mexican Treasury is bringing $20,000,000 in gold bars here, but nothing was known of this at the mint.

RARE MASTODON FOUND.

The American Museum of Natural History announced that it had purchased the first mountable skeleton of a new species of mastodon of the Tertiary period. The newly found variety, which is yet to be named, is distinguished by a jaw much longer than that of any of the Tertiary mastodons known.

It is held that the find is another evidence that there once existed an Alaskan land bridge over which animals of a prehistoric age passed from Asia to North America. It is regarded as a descendant of a race of European mastodons, the skeleton of one of which is now on exhibition in the Museum of Natural History in Paris. In the Western Hemisphere, however, the long-jawed mastodon attained greater size than did the European variety. This animal stood eight feet high and its bones are very massive. The skeleton is practically complete. It was unearthed in northern Texas.

MAGNET INDUSTRY IN ENGLAND.

The Sheffield Daily Telegraph states that Sheffield promises to become the center of the manufacture of magnets, which were obtained before the war almost exclusively from Germany. On the outbreak of hostilities only one or two firms in Great Britain had given any attention to this particular product, although Sheffield had been for a long period supplying the steel to makers in Germany and elsewhere abroad. The collapse of the German supply placed the British electrical trade in a serious difficulty and for some time looked ominous, especially in the magneto industry. Sheffield, however, is said to have saved the situation. A half dozen or more firms there have been producing magnets on a large scale and of satisfactory quality for a considerable time, and there is every reason to believe that when peace returns the British magnet industry will remain.

ODD INSTINCTS AND HABITS OF ANIMALS.

Just as men have developed their savage state into pleasant civilized beings, so naturally dogs and cats and horses and hogs and other domestic animals are very different from the wild things that were caught in the forest and trained to usefulness, but there are some habits inherited from their far-away ancestors which they still retain, and by which they are distinguished one from the other.

We never question, for instance, why a horse runs so swiftly and has such power of endurance, but we must remember that his ancestors had to flee and defend themselves from the wolves—their greatest enemies—and that their rearing and plunging was also a former means of defense if the enemy sprang on their backs. Their neigh was a watchword and call when wild horses went in droves, and some sort of a signal was necessary to keep them from straying.

Sheep, when frightened, always run to an elevation, because their ancestors originally came from the mountains. They always follow a leader, because in the dangerous mountain passes their ancestors had to go in single file.

Hogs grunt because their feeding grounds were thick woods, where they could not see one another, and sound was necessary to keep them together.

Dogs have a way of turning around several times before they lie down. This looks very foolish now, but when they were wild things, centuries ago, they slept in the tall grass and turned around several times to hollow out a bed and they have never outgrown this habit, but to this late day they will turn around on a rug, just as if they were in the tall grass.

Cats have, perhaps, the most traces of old ancestral habits, says the Virginia Pilot. Many times they do have a trace of the lion or the tiger very near the surface. Their uncertain temper, their purring and growling, their sudden bounds, their tendency to scratch, all comes from the forest and the jungle.

All these and many more traits can be found, but when we canter across country on our ponies and fatten our respectable hogs for the markets, and make pets of our dogs and cats, we forget how far these traits have traveled, and that when the world was younger its live stock was of a very different order.

CUFF BUTTONS.

Gold plated, bright finished, assorted shapes, set with fine brilliants. Price 10c postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

TRICK CIGARETTE BOX.

This one is a corker! Get a box right away, if you want to have a barrel of joy. Here's the secret: It looks like an ordinary red box of Turkish cigarettes. But it contains a trigger, under which you place a paper cap. Offer your friend a smoke and he raises the lid of the box. That explodes the cap, and if you are wise you will get out of sight with the box before he gets over thinking he was shot. Price 15c., postpaid.

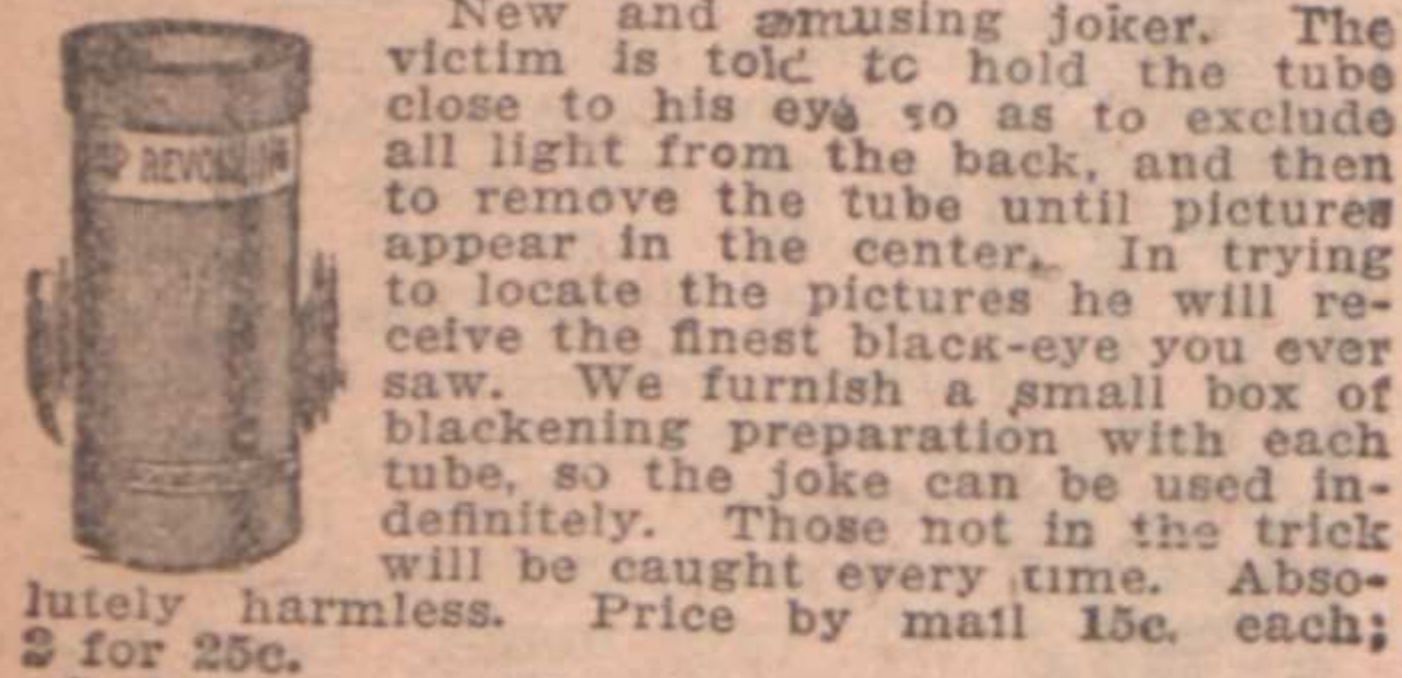

Wolff Novelty Co., 168 W. 23d St., N. Y.

The Bottle Imp.—The peculiarity of this little bottle is that it cannot be made to lie down, and yet by simply passing the hand over it, the performer causes it to do so. This trick affords great amusement, and is of convenient size to carry about.

Price, 10c.

C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

BLACK-EYE JOKE.

New and amusing joker. The victim is told to hold the tube close to his eye so as to exclude all light from the back, and then to remove the tube until pictures appear in the center. In trying to locate the pictures he will receive the finest black-eye you ever saw. We furnish a small box of blackening preparation with each tube, so the joke can be used indefinitely. Those not in the trick will be caught every time. Absolutely harmless. Price by mail 15c. each; 2 for 25c.

C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

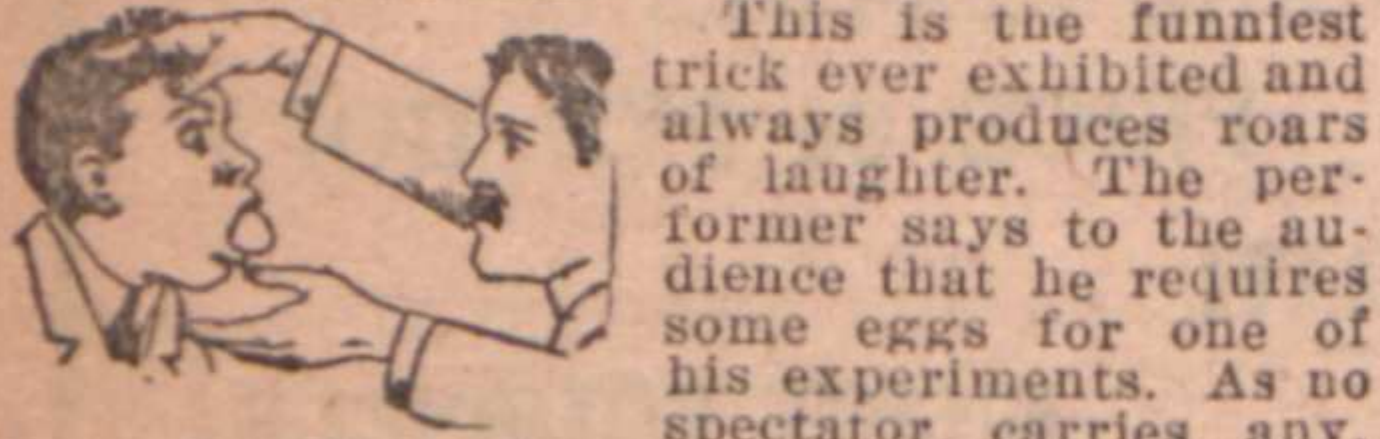

NEW SURPRISE NOVELTY.

Foxy Grandpa, Mr. Peewee and other comical faces artistically colored, to which is attached a long rubber tube, connected with a rubber ball, which can be filled with water, the rubber ball being carried in the pocket, a slight pressure on the bulb causes a long stream, the result can easily be seen.

Price, 15c.,

Postpaid.

Wolff Novelty Co., 168 W. 23d St., N. Y.

LAUGHABLE EGG TRICK.

This is the funniest trick ever exhibited and always produces roars of laughter. The performer says to the audience that he requires some eggs for one of his experiments. As no spectator carries any, he calls his assistant, taps him on top of the head, he gags, and an egg comes out of his mouth. This is repeated until six eggs are produced. It is an easy trick to perform, once you know how, and always makes a hit. Directions given for working it. Price, 25 cents by mail, postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

RUBBER SUCKER.Rubber Vacuum Suckers

The latest novelty out! Dishes and plates will stick to the table, cups to the saucers like glue. Put one under a glass and then try to lift it. You can't. Lots of fun. Always put it on a smooth surface and wet the rubber. Many other tricks can be accomplished with this novelty.

Price 12 cts. each by mail, postpaid.

FRANK SMITH, 383 Lenox Ave., N. Y.

The 1917
ARROWElectric Light*Great Bicycle Offer!

Send the coupon below today for free catalog of the new 1917 "ARROW" Bicycle. Read the sensational improvements in the new 1917 model. Other features, too. Motorcycle type. Built with all the durability and elegance of the very highest grade motorcycles. A positive wonder for speed, easy riding and comfort. The biggest bicycle value ever built. All sizes for boys, men and women. Send the coupon today for free catalog.

Pay As You Ride

We ship the ARROW to you without a penny down. Start riding and enjoying it right away. And pay the special rock-bottom price—a small amount each month—while you ride. If you do not agree when you see the 1917 Arrow that it is the biggest bicycle bargain you ever saw, send it back at our expense. You be the judge. Send coupon for free catalog.

Send Coupon NOW!

Don't delay! Learn about the sensational 1917 Arrow right away. Take advantage of our special rock-bottom price offer. Get the free catalog and details of our Pay-As-You-Ride offer. Send coupon now while this offer lasts.

ARROW CYCLE COMPANY, Dept. 2654
19th Street & California Ave., CHICAGO

Electric Light

Motorcycle type frame, saddle, handlebars, pedals, mud-guard, stand and luggage carrier. Fisk Thorn-Proof Non-Skid tires. New Coaster Brake, tool kit and tire pump. Other new features. Write today.

Arrow Cycle Co.

Dept. 2654 - 19th Street and California Ave. CHICAGO, ILL.

Please send me free catalog of the New 1917 ARROW and particulars of your rock-bottom "Pay-As-You-Ride" Offer.

Name.....

Address.....

KNITTER

Every boy who wants a whip-lash, pair of reins, or any other knitted article of similar kind should have a Knitter. Anybody can work it. The most beautiful designs can be made by using colored worsteds with this handy little object. It is handsomely lacquered, strongly made, and the wires are very durable. Price, 10c. each, by mail, postpaid.

Wolff Novelty Co., 168 W. 23d St., N. Y.

ELECTRIC CIGAR CASE.

This handsome cigar case appears to be filled with fine cigars. If your friend smokes ask him to have a cigar with you. As he reaches out for one the cigars, like a flash, instantly disappear into the case entirely out of sight, greatly to his surprise and astonishment. You can beg his pardon and state you thought there were some cigars left in the case. A slight pressure on sides of case causes the cigars to disappear as if by magic. By touching a wire at bottom of case the cigars instantly appear again in their proper position in the case. As real tobacco is used they are sure to deceive any one. It is one of the best practical jokes of the season. A novelty with which you can have lots of fun.

Price 35 cents, sent by parcel post, postpaid.

C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d Street, N. Y.

$ 2 to $500 EACH paid for hundreds of old Coins. Keep ALL money dated before 1895 and send TEN cents for New Illustrated Coin Value Book, size 4x7. It may mean your Fortune. CLARKE COIN Co., Box 95, Le Roy, N. Y.

Rider Agents Wanted

Everywhere to ride and exhibit the new Ranger "Motorbike" completely equipped with electric light and horn, carrier, stand, tool tank, coaster-brake, mud guards and anti-skid tires. Choice of 44 other styles, colors and sizes in the famous "Ranger" line of bicycles.

DELIVERED FREE on approval and 30 DAYS TRIAL. Send for big free catalog and particulars of our Factory-direct-to-Rider marvelous offers and terms.

TIRES, Lamps, Horns, Wheels, Sundries, and parts for all bicycles—at half usual prices.

SEND NO MONEY but tell us exactly what you need. Do not buy until you get our prices, terms and the big FREE catalog.

MEAD CYCLE COMPANY
Dept. H 188 CHICAGO

MAGIC CARD BOX.—A very cleverly made box of exchanging or vanishing cards. In fact, any number of tricks of this character can be performed by it. A very necessary magical accessory.

Price, 15c.
FRANK SMITH, 383 Lenox Ave., N. Y.

LINK THE LINK PUZZLE.

The sensation of the day. Pronounced by all, the most baffling and scientific novelty out. Thousands have worked at it for hours without mastering it, still it can be done in two seconds by giving the links the proper twist, but unless you know how, the harder you twist them the tighter they grow. Price, 6c.; 3 for 15c.; one dozen, 50c., by mail, postpaid.

FRANK SMITH, 383 Lenox Ave., N. Y.

THE JOKE SPIKE.

This joke spike is an ordinary iron spike or very large nail, the same as is found in any carpenter's nail box. At the small end is a small steel needle, 1/2 inch in length, firmly set in spike. Take your friend's hat or coat and hang it on the wall by driving (with a hammer) the spike through it into the wall; the needle in spike will not injure the hat or garment, neither will it show on wall or wood where it has been driven. The deception is perfect, as the spike appears to have been driven half-way through the hat or coat, which can be left hanging on the wall. Price, 10 cents, or 3 for 25 cents; by mail, postpaid.

C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d Street, N. Y.

RUBBER TACKS.

They come six in a box. A wonderful imitation of the real tack. Made of rubber. The box in which they come is the ordinary tack box. This is a great parlor entertainer and you can play a lot of tricks with the tacks. Place them in the palm of your hand, point upward. Then slap the other hand over the tacks and it will seem as if you are committing suicide. Or you can show the tacks and then put them in your mouth and chew them, making believe you have swallowed them. Your friends will think you are a magician. Then, again, you can exhibit the tacks and then quickly push one in your cheek or somebody else's cheek and they will shriek with fear. Absolutely harmless and a very practical and funny joke. Price, by mail, 10c. a box of six tacks; 3 for 25c.

WOLF Novelty Co., 168 W. 23d St., N. Y.

GREAT BURGLAR PUZZLE.

The latest and most fascinating puzzle ever placed on the market. Patented May 30. It consists of four revolving dials, each dial containing 16 figures, 64 figures in all. To open the safe these dials must be turned around until the figures in each of the 16 columns added together total 40. The puzzle is made on the plan of the combination lock on the large iron safes that open on a combination of figures. Persons have been known to sit up all night, so interested have they become trying to get each column to total 40, in this fascinating puzzle. With the printed key which we send with each puzzle the figures can be set in a few minutes so as to total 40 in each column.

Price 15 cents; mailed, postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

LUCKY PENNY POCKET PIECE.

This handsome pocket piece is made of aluminum, resembling somewhat in size and appearance a silver dollar. In the center of the pocket piece is a new one-cent U. S. coin, inserted in such a way that it cannot be removed. (U. S. laws prevent our showing this coin in our engraving). On one side of the pocket piece are the words, "Lucky penny pocket piece; I bring good luck," and the design of a horseshoe. On the opposite side, "I am your mascot," "Keep me and never go broke," and two sprigs of four-leafed clover. These handsome pocket pieces are believed by many to be harbingers of good luck. Price 12 cents; 3 for 30 cents; by mail, postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

HALF MASKS.

False-faces beaten a mile! There are 7 in a set and represent an Indian, a Japanese girl, a clown, Foxy Grandpa, an English Johnny Atkins and an Automobillist. Beautifully lithographed in handsome colors on a durable quality of cardboard. They have eyeholes and string perforations. Price, 6c. each, or the full set of 7 for 25c., postpaid.

C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

SNAPPER CIGAR.

The real thing for the cigar grafter. If you smoke you must have met him. He sees a few choice cigars in your pocket and makes no bones about asking you for one. You are all prepared for him this time. How? Take one of these cigars snappers (which is so much like a real cigar you are liable to smoke it yourself by mistake). Bend the spring backwards the lighted end, and as you offer the cigar let go the spring and the victim gets a sharp, stinging snap on the fingers. A sure cure for grafters. Price, by mail, ten cents each, or three for 25c.

C. BEHR, 150 62d St., New York City.

GOOD LUCK GUN FOB.

The real western article. carried by the cowboys. It is made of fine leather, with a highly nickeled buckle. The holster contains a metal gun, of the same pattern as those used by all the most famous scouts. Any boy wearing one of these fobs will attract attention. It will give him an air of western romance. The prettiest and most serviceable watch fob ever made. Send for one to-day. Price 20 cents each by mail postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

READ THIS ONE!

"Moving Picture Stories"

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE DEVOTED TO PHOTOPLAYS AND PLAYERS

PRICE 6c PER COPY

PRICE 6c PER COPY

THE BEST FILM MAGAZINE ON EARTH

BUY A COPY!

ENJOY YOURSELF!

Magnificent Colored Cover Portraits of Prominent Performers!

32 PAGES OF READING

OUT EVERY FRIDAY

EACH NUMBER CONTAINS

New Portraits and Biographies of Actors and Actresses
Six Stories of the Best Films on the Screens
Elegant Half-tone Scenes from the Plays
Interesting Articles About Prominent People in the Films
Doings of Actors and Actresses in the Studios and while Picture-making
Lessons in Scenario Writing, and names of Companies who buy your plays
Poems, Jokes, and every bright Feature of Interest in Making Moving Pictures

THIS LITTLE MAGAZINE GIVES YOU MORE FOR YOUR MONEY THAN ANY OTHER SIMILAR PUBLICATION ON THE MARKET!

Its authors are the very best that money can procure; its profuse illustrations are exquisite, and its special articles are by the greatest experts in their particular line.

No amount of money is being spared to make this publication the very best of its kind in the world.

Buy a copy NOW from your newsdealer, or send us 6 cents in money or postage-stamps, and we will mail you any number you desire.

MOVING PICTURE STORIES, Inc., 168 West 23d Street, New York City

FAME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY

LATEST ISSUES

559 Starting His Own Business; or, The Boy Who Caught On.
 560 A Corner in Stock; or, The Wall Street Boy Who Won.
 561 First in the Field; or, Doing Business for Himself.
 562 A Broker at Eighteen; or, Roy Gilbert's Wall Street Career.
 563 Only a Dollar; or, From Errand Boy to Owner.
 564 Price & Co., Boy Brokers; or, The Young Traders of Wall Street.
 565 A Winning Risk; or, The Boy Who Made Good.
 566 From a Dime to a Million; or, A Wide-Awake Wall Street Boy.
 567 The Path to Good Luck; or, The Boy Miner of Death Valley.
 568 Mart Morton's Money; or, A Corner in Wall Street Stocks.
 569 Tips to Fortune; or, A Lucky Wall Street Deal.
 570 Striking His Gait; or, The Perils of a Boy Engineer.
 571 From Messenger to Millionaire; or, A Boy's Luck in Wall Street.
 572 The Boy Gold Hunters; or, After a Pirate's Treasure.
 573 Tricking the Traders; or, A Wall Street Boy's Game of Chance.
 574 Jack Merry's Grit; or, Making a Man of Himself.
 575 A Golden Shower; or, The Boy Banker of Wall Street.
 576 Making a Record; or, The Luck of a Working Boy.
 577 A Fight for Money; or, From School to Wall Street.
 578 Stranded Out West; or, The Boy Who Found a Silver Mine.
 579 Ben Bassford's Luck; or, Working on Wall Street Tips.
 580 A Young Gold Miner; or, The Treasure of the Secret Caves.
 581 Round to Get Rich; or, How a Wall Street Boy Made Money.

582 Friendless Frank; or, The Boy Who Became Famous.
 583 A $30,000 Tip; or, The Young Weazel of Wall Street.
 584 Plucky Bob; or, The Boy Who Won Success.
 585 From Newsboy to Banker; or, Rob Lake's Rise in Wall Street.
 586 A Golden Stake; or, The Treasure of the Indies.
 587 A Grip on the Market; or, A Hot Time in Wall Street.
 588 Watching His Chance; or, From Ferry Boy to Captain.
 589 A Game of Gold; or, The Young King of Wall Street.
 590 A Wizard for Luck; or, Getting Ahead in the World.
 591 A Fortune at Stake; or, A Wall Street Messenger's Deal.
 592 His Last Nickel; or, What It Did for Jack Rand

For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 5 cents per copy, in money or postage stamps.

NOTICE—The following numbers PRICE SIX CENTS.

593 Nat Noble, the Little Broker; or, The Boy Who Started a Wall Street Panic.
 594 A Struggle For Fame; or, The Gamest Boy in the World.
 595 The Young Money Magnate; or, The Wall Street Boy Who Broke the Market.
 596 A Lucky Contract; or, The Boy Who Made a Raft of Money.
 597 A Big Risk; or, The Game That Won.
 598 On Pirate's Isle; or, The Treasure of the Seven Craters.
 599 A Wall Street Mystery; or, The Boy Who Beat the Syndicate.
 600 Dick Hadley's Mine; or, The Boy Gold Diggers of Mexico.
 601 A Boy Stock Broker; or, From Errand Boy to Millionaire.
 602 Facing the World; or, A Poor Boy's Fight For Fortune.

FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher,

168 West 23d St., N. Y.

IF YOU WANT ANY BACK NUMBERS

of our weeklies and cannot procure them from newsdealers, they can be obtained from this office direct. Write out and fill in your Order and send it to us with the price of the weeklies you want and we will send them to you by return mail. POSTAGE STAMPS TAKEN THE SAME AS MONEY.

FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher,

168 West 23d St., N. Y.

OUR TEN-CENT HAND BOOKS

No. 46. HOW TO MAKE AND USE ELECTRICITY.—A description of the wonderful uses of electricity and electro magnetism; together with full instructions for making Electric Toys, Batteries, etc. By George Trebel, A.M., M.D. Containing over fifty illustrations.

No. 47. HOW TO BREAK, RIDE AND DRIVE A HORSE.—A complete treatise on the horse. Describing the most useful horses for business, the best horses for the road; also valuable recipes for diseases peculiar to the horse.

No. 48. HOW TO BUILD AND SAIL CANOES.—A handy book for boys, containing full directions for constructing canoes and the most popular manner of sailing them. Fully illustrated.

No. 49. HOW TO DEBATE.—Giving rules for conducting debates, outlines for debates, questions for discussion, and the best sources for procuring information on the question given.

No. 50. HOW TO STUFF BIRDS AND ANIMALS.—A valuable book, giving instructions in collecting, preparing, mounting and preserving birds, animals and insects.

No. 51. HOW TO DO TRICKS WITH CARDS.—Containing explanations of the general principles of sleight-of-hand applicable to card tricks; of card tricks with ordinary cards, and not requiring sleight-of-hand; of tricks involving sleight-of-hand, or the use of specially prepared cards. Illustrated.

No. 52. HOW TO PLAY CARDS.—Giving the rules and full directions for playing Euchre, Cribbage, Casino, Forty-Five, Rounce, Pedro Sancho, Draw Poker, Auction Pitch, All Fours, and many other popular games of cards.

No. 53. HOW TO WRITE LETTERS.—A wonderful little book, telling you how to write to your sweetheart, your father, mother, sister, brother, employer; and, in fact, everybody and anybody you wish to write to.

No. 54. HOW TO KEEP AND MANAGE PETS.—Giving complete information as to the manner and method of raising, keeping, taming, breeding, and managing all kinds of pets; also giving full instructions for making cages, etc. Fully explained by twenty-eight illustrations.

No. 55. HOW TO COLLECT STAMPS AND COINS.—Containing valuable information regarding the collecting and arranging of stamps and coins. Handsomely illustrated.

No. 56. HOW TO BECOME AN ENGINEER.—Containing full instructions how to become a locomotive engineer; also directions for building a model locomotive; together with a full description of everything an engineer should know.

No. 60. HOW TO BECOME A PHOTOGRAPHER.—Containing useful information regarding the Camera and how to work it; also how to make Photographic Magic Lantern Slides and other Transparencies. Handsomely illustrated.

No. 62. HOW TO BECOME A WEST POINT MILITARY CADET.—Explains how to gain admittance, course of Study, Examinations, Duties, Staff of Officers, Post Guard, Police Regulations, Fire Department, and all a boy should know to be a cadet. By Lu Senarens.

No. 63. HOW TO BECOME A NAVAL CADET.—Complete instructions of how to gain admission to the Annapolis Naval Academy. Also containing the course of instruction, description of grounds and buildings, historical sketch, and everything a boy should know to become an officer in the United States Navy. By Lu Senarens.

No. 64. HOW TO MAKE ELECTRICAL MACHINES.—Containing full directions for making electrical machines, induction coils, dynamos, and many novel toys to be worked by electricity. By R. A. R. Bennet. Fully illustrated.

No. 65. MULDOON'S JOKES.—The most original joke book ever published, and it is brimful of wit and humor. It contains a large collection of songs, jokes, conundrums, etc., of Terrence Muldoon, the great wit, humorist, and practical joker of the day.

No. 66. HOW TO DO PUZZLES.—Containing over three hundred interesting puzzles and conundrums, with key to same. A complete book. Fully illustrated.

No. 67. HOW TO DO ELECTRICAL TRICKS.—Containing a large collection of instructive and highly amusing electrical tricks, together with illustrations. By A. Anderson.

No. 68. HOW TO DO CHEMICAL TRICKS.—Containing over one hundred highly amusing and instructive tricks with chemicals. By A. Anderson. Handsomely illustrated.

No. 69. HOW TO DO SLEIGHT-OF-HAND.—Containing over fifty of the latest and best tricks used by magicians. Also containing the secret of second sight. Fully illustrated.

No. 70. HOW TO MAKE MAGIC TOYS.—Containing full directions for making Magic Toys and devices of many kinds. Fully illustrated.

No. 71. HOW TO DO MECHANICAL TRICKS.—Containing complete illustrations for performing over sixty Mechanical Tricks. Fully illustrated.

No. 72. HOW TO DO SIXTY TRICKS WITH CARDS.—Embracing all of the latest and most deceptive card tricks, with illustrations.

No. 73. HOW TO DO TRICKS WITH NUMBERS.—Showing many curious tricks with figures and the magic of numbers. By A. Anderson. Fully illustrated.

No. 74. HOW TO WRITE LETTERS CORRECTLY.—Containing full instructions for writing letters on almost any subject; also rules for punctuation and composition, with specimen letters.

No. 75. HOW TO BECOME A CONJURER.—Containing tricks with Dominoes, Dice Cups and Balls, Hats, etc. Embracing thirty-six illustrations. By A. Anderson.

No. 76. HOW TO TELL FORTUNES BY THE HAND.—Containing rules for telling fortunes by the aid of lines of the hand, or the secret of palmistry. Also the secret of telling future events by aid of moles, marks, scars, etc. Illustrated.

No. 77. HOW TO DO FORTY TRICKS WITH CARDS.—Containing deceptive Card Tricks as performed by leading conjurers and magicians. Arranged for home amusement. Fully illustrated.

No. 78. HOW TO DO THE BLACK ART.—Containing a complete description of the mysteries of Magic and Sleight-of-hand, together with many wonderful experiments. By A. Anderson. Illustrated.

No. 79. HOW TO BECOME AN ACTOR.—Containing complete instructions how to make up for various characters on the stage; together with the duties of the Stage Manager, Prompter, Scenic Artist and Property Man.

No. 80. GUS WILLIAMS' JOKE BOOK.—Containing the latest jokes, anecdotes and funny stories of this world-renowned German comedian. Sixty-four pages; handsome colored cover, containing a half-tone photo of the author.

No. 81. HOW TO MESMERIZE.—Containing the most approved method of mesmerism; animal magnetism, or, magnetic healing. By Prof. Leo Hugo Koch, A.C.S., author of "How to Hypnotize," etc.

No. 82. HOW TO DO PALMISTRY.—Containing the most approved methods of reading the lines on the hand, together with a full explanation of their meaning. Also explaining phrenology, and the key of telling characters by the bumps on the head. By Leo Hugo Koch, A.C.S. Fully illustrated.

No. 83. HOW TO HYPNOTIZE.—Containing valuable and instructive information regarding the science of hypnotism. Also explaining the most approved methods which are employed by the leading hypnotists of the world. By Leo Hugo Koch, A.C.S.

No. 84. HOW TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.—Containing information regarding choice of subjects, the use of words and the manner of preparing and submitting manuscripts. Also containing valuable information as to the neatness, legibility and general composition of manuscripts.

For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 10c. per copy, or 3 for 25c., in money or postage stamps.

FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher,

168 West